The system first showed its failings and weaknesses in the State that first embraced it—and with disastrous results. In its anxiety to establish the guaranty principle in popular esteem the State banking board was superficial and inefficient in its examination of new banks. Of the many that rushed into existence to take advantage of the business-getting possibilities a large number were weak at the outset, besides which unscrupulous men were attracted to the business. Because of the attractiveness of the guaranty, and lulled to a sense of security by its existence, the general public became less discriminating in their choice of banks. As a result bad banking became the rule.

The fact that Oklahoma did not enjoy even average prosperity in the period from 1909 to 1913 hastened the debacle. During these five years 27 banks failed, and the guaranty fund was being rapidly depleted. State banks hastened to reorganize under national charters. In desperation the banking board allowed insolvent banks to continue operations, buying their securities and making deposits in them in the hope of restoring them to solvency. As might have been expected, matters only went from bad to worse. In 1913 the system was admittedly a complete failure. Repeal of the law nevertheless seemed hopeless. In spite of the many failures of the guaranteed State banks during this period, when only three national banks failed in the State, the public favored a system which saved the independent depositors from loss. But the law could not stand up under a continued succession of failures.

In 1913 the fund was left with only $35,000 cash on hand and with $400,000 of guaranty warrants outstanding. The ultimate crash was delayed for several years by the World War and the temporary boom that followed in its wake for agriculture. Bank failures became less frequent until 1920, and deposits in the guaranty fund grew until the outstanding warrants had been redeemed and there was $75,000 cash available. Again national banks had begun to enter the system in large numbers.

In 1921 crop values dropped and failures followed failures. Banks sound in themselves became overtaxed beyond their strength by assessments to cover the banks in liquidation and also crashed. The law was finally repealed March 31, 1923, with the fund showing a deficit of seven to eight million dollars.

The experience in Kansas paralleled that of Oklahoma. At first it looked like a success, and it was thought to be due to the merit of the provisions wherein the law differed from that of the neighboring States. Only three small banks failed during the first 10 years after the system was initiated. Deposits had poured into the banks, which made loans freely. Then came the deflation period following the postwar prosperity. In the depression 100 banks failed, two-thirds of which were members of the guaranty fund. As a result, the fund was depleted. By 1926 it had only $17,996 in cash, but there was outstanding $10,000,000 of interest-bearing certificates. With the maximum assessments that could legally be levied on the remaining 630 banks, it would have required 20 years to redeem them, provided no more banks failed and no interest were paid. Accordingly many banks applied for permission to withdraw from the system, and were permitted by the courts to do so, on certain conditions. Withdrawals followed on a large scale, and there being no alternative, the legislature repealed the law in 1929. The State had to issue bonds to meet the losses incurred.

In Nebraska the experience at first was like that in Kansas, with fair sailing up to 1920, until which year only eight banks had closed their doors. Then came the conditions that wrecked the other systems, and as elsewhere, hundreds of banks found themselves with frozen assets on which they could not realize. About 115 banks went through receivership, and the $2,500,000 in the fund soon became exhausted. As large assessments were imposed on the solvent banks, the depositors lost nothing, but by 1923 the fund was about ready to collapse.

As this would have meant delayed repayments to depositors and because it was recognized that debtors are generally more prompt in paying their debts to a going concern than to one in process of liquidation, an emergency measure was enacted creating a banking commission to take over and operate failed banks as going concerns. It was hoped that with the coming of better times the value of their assets would increase and the guaranty fund would save the losses incurred by dumping securities on the market under adverse conditions, besides which it was felt that drastic economies could be effected if liquidation proved necessary. For a time this staved off failures of the fund and restored a few banks to solvency.

In the end it only made matters worse by paying off some depositors in full and continuing to receive deposits from others. Though the public was soothed by its faith in the guaranty system and runs on the banks were not what they might otherwise have been, the system had much to do with making conditions bad as they were, or worse than they might otherwise have been. It put a strain on the sound banks, having cost the members 43 per cent of their capital, an average of 3 per cent a year.

Thus the system was cracking under the strain six years ago, and it was finally shattered. In October of 1928, 40 of the biggest banks in the State organized to resist the payment of further special assessments. Finally, after an audit and investigation made by Mr. SHALLENBERGER, who, as governor of the State, signed the act, it was repealed at a special session of the legislature called for the purpose on March 15, 1930. There was a deficit estimated at $16,000,000, and 65,000 depositors of failed banks were awaiting restitution. The repealer provided for a settlement fund by special assessments on the banks for a period of 10 years, expected to provide about $3,000,000 in addition to a similar amount to come from special assessments under the old law, and an appropriation of $8,000,000 by the State.

The Washington law has been inoperative since 1921, and was finally repealed in 1929. That of North Dakota was repealed by chapter 122 of the session laws of the same year, which went into effect on July 25, 1930. An opinion of the Attorney General was handed down on August 13, 1930, to the effect that assessments levied after July 1, 1929, were not enforceable. The assets of the fund, amounting to $26,000, were sufficient to pay a dividend of 10 per cent of claims on three banks in the class which closed after April 30, 1925. If it were prorated to all failures prior to July 1, 1929, the dividend would be approximately 15 per cent. The final deficit in the fund was some $14,000,000. As for Mississippi, the law was repealed in 1930. In his testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Comptroller of the Currency estimated the deficit in this fund to have been between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. An issue of $5,000,000 in State bonds was planned to take up the certificates outstanding in the hands of the depositors of the 31 failed banks.

I have tried to outline as briefly as possible the history of this experiment during the past quarter of a century. If that history proves anything, it proves that even the existence of such a fund can not prevent bank closings and panics if conditions are fundamentally unsound, that revenues from a fair basic assessment can never be sufficient to meet the requirements of such a program, that the effort to save deposits in unsound banks leads merely to a weakening of sound, honestly, and efficiently managed and otherwise strong banks and pulls them down also.

Is it any wonder that the superintendent of banks and the Depositors' Guaranty Fund Commission of South Dakota express the opinion that this bill would place a premium on bad management, and that the secretary of banking of the State of Pennsylvania expressed his opposition before the Pennsylvania Bankers' Association on May 18? Is it surprising that our Comptroller of the Currency is opposed to the bill as one which would not accomplish the purpose for which it is intended but would rather tend to destroy the Federal reserve system by driving out of it the strong banks? Who is in a better position to pass judgment upon matters of this kind? And we can judge for ourselves. The facts presented in regard to the deficits on liquidation of the systems tried out were the results prior to the present depression. What would those deficits be if they had not previously been closed out? I hesitate to make even a wild guess.

If there is anything that has been proven by the history of banking in general and of depositors' fund guaranty in particular, it is that no panacea will take the place of sound banking practice and honesty and efficiency in management. Our colleague [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] was Governor of Nebraska when the guaranty law was signed. He was chief examiner in charge of a recent investigation of the banking system in the State, and made the report as a result of which the legislation was called into special session to liquidate the system.

In his testimony at the hearings of the committee he stated (p. 106):

> A great percentage of bank failures occurs because of the violation of two or three laws essential to sound banking.

And previously (p. 104) he stated that if we had competent supervision, insisted on observance and enforcement of the banking laws, and did not permit bankers to violate sound banking principles, there would not have been the failures that actually occurred.

I want to call your attention also to the fact that one of the sources of the fund proposed in the Senate bill would be the Federal Treasury to the extent of more than $150,000,000 that came from the franchise tax on the Federal reserve system. The necessity for providing this sum would upset the efforts we have made to date to balance the Federal Budget. To provide that additional deficit would mean either special taxes in addition to those we are about to impose, or to increase the debt to that extent.

I wish also to point out that $121,000,000 of these taxes were paid in just two years, 1921 and 1922, and that earnings now available for the purpose and likely to be available in the future will probably be negligible. In the same way, the earnings of the reserve system, which are to be called upon for the purpose of the fund are also not particularly striking, though referred to by the author of the bill as very great. Of the nearly $525,000,000 earned during the 18 years of its existence, $149,000,000 came in a single year, nearly 30 per cent, in 1921.

If we add the two banner years, 1928 and 1929, when earnings were, respectively, thirty-two and thirty-six millions, we find that practically 40 per cent of the earnings can be accounted for by only three years, which are hardly likely to be duplicated in the near future. The load is thus likely to come upon the individual member banks of the system, and one has but to examine the facts furnished at the hearings to realize how burdensome that may be if the experience of the individual States with guaranty funds should be duplicated.

This measure should not have been introduced at this time and should have been defeated in the House as one of the most unsound measures affecting banks that has ever come before this body.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, confidence of the public in its institutions is a prime requisite of a successful state. When any public or quasi-public activity is faced with a denial of public confidence, in whole or in part, that activity suffers. At such times the repercussions may be heard from afar, the effects are felt in every related industry, and when the activity embraces a scope national in extent the entire Nation may easily feel the tremors.

Following the era of unparalled prosperity, which grew out of the boom times of the war and the ensuing period of speculation and expansion, came the current depression. Its cruel destroying hand has reached into every city, hamlet, and rural community in the land until it is a fortunate family which has not experienced the blighting touch of fear and want.

Few if any of the industries of America have found easy sailing through the contemporary economic crisis. Most have been forced to close their mills, mines, and factories, either altogether or partially, with the inevitable result that the production of new wealth has practically ceased and unnumbered thousands of willing workers have been thrown to the mercy of charity, public and private.

It is a vital emergency now facing the American people. We must face the hazards squarely and strive with the fullest earnestness at our command to overcome the obstacles confounding us to-day.

During the past decade the banking system of our country has to a large extent suffered from the identical trends which likewise threw most other major businesses into the economic doldrums. From 1914 to 1931, inclusive, 8,309 banks have failed in the United States. Last year alone saw 2,290 banking houses go into the hands of the receiver. Their plight was chiefly the same as that of other failing business houses. It was a logical tail to the kite of overdevelopment. It was because, as has been well stated, there were too many speculators and too few bankers. It was a natural consequence of blowing the economic bag too full of wind.

Most bankers are fundamentally honest, fair, and considerate. Few would voluntarily betray their customers and few did. The comparatively few bandits who burglarized banks from the inside were merely the bad eggs that will, despite every precaution, slip into the basket. Their kin are found in every other industry and must be weeded out exactly as the farmer cleans his garden. In the long run the banking fraternity itself can be depended upon to take care of that part of the condition. But it can not of itself prohibit the recurrence of panics with their devastating effects upon our people. But such social cataclysms as the present depression must be averted. During such times the failure of banks wipes out the lifetime savings of people least able to withstand such a tragedy.

It causes fear to become widespread until those in charge of business are likely to hesitate before embarking in further enterprises. Thus industry is halted. More than this, the widespread failure of banking institutions ties up untold millions of dollars which are most needed in times of economic stress. The poor man who over a period of years places his little savings in the bank "for a rainy day" must be assured the protection of those savings when the rainy day rolls around. This task is one of the many which the present Congress must grapple with and conquer if we are to survive this depression.

The banks which failed in the United States during the past 10 years placed in jeopardy an estimated twenty-five hundred millions of deposits, while the failures of 1931 adversely affected a total of one and three-quarter billion dollars of deposits. The very fact that this money is withdrawn from circulation, tied up in the administration of the affairs of the defunct banking houses, has an enervating effect upon the entire order of society. Not only this but the failures with their consequent withdrawal of funds incites fear in the minds of people whose funds are deposited in sound institutions. This is translated into runs on the sound banks and hoarding by individuals. Tin boxes, mattresses, and pockets take the place of banks with the result that an ever-increasing sum is withdrawn from the money market, creating additional hardship and curtailment. It is like a snowball rolled through moist snow, ever increasing in size.

If any nations of the world are comparable to the United States and its institutions, they are Canada, England, and Scotland. They were affected by the depression before we felt it, and certainly the paralysis of their industry has been far more aggravated than our own. However, investigation discloses that Canada has experienced but one bank failure in the past 10 years, England has not had a failure in the contemporary century, and Scotland has not had a bank failure in the past hundred years. It is hardly conceivable that the financiers of those countries are endowed with a keener foresight; that they possess an integrity less untarnished. Consequently in view of the variance in results it must be that their systems of banking are superior to our own.

When Americans are assured that when they place their money in a bank they will be able to have access to it when they want it they will no longer withhold their confidence, hoarding will cease, and great sums of money now lying dormant will be available for the transaction of public business.

Before the Congress to-day there are pending several bills designed to secure the deposits of our people when their money is placed in the keeping of our banking houses. It is a movement toward additional regulation by Government of business, but the business to be regulated is so public in character that the additional regulation is to be commended if it achieves the ends for which it is dedicated.

The so-called Steagall bill is in the nature of a bank depositors' guaranty law. It proposes the establishment of a billion-dollar fund to guarantee deposits in banks. The fund is obtained in the following manner: $150,000,000 from the Federal Treasury representing the amount the Treasury has received in franchise taxes, $150,000,000 contribution from the $300,000,000 surplus of reserve banks, a $100,000,000 assessment upon reserve member banks, an additional $100,000,000 assessment per year upon reserve banks if necessary, and loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to a total of half a billion dollars if that much is necessary. Such a program would not result in any increased taxation, would not actually draw a penny from circulation, and much of the money is already earned funds by the Federal reserve banks in excess of interest on investment allowed by law.

If such a law were in effect and a bank that joined the guaranty fund failed, the Federal liquidating board would be required within 90 days to pay to depositors not less than 50 per cent of their deposits if they did not exceed $1,000 and not less than 25 per cent if they did. Within six months of the date of the failure a second installment would be paid, covering the balance of $1,000 accounts and 25 per cent of all others. The larger accounts would then be repaid in two more 6-month installments of 25 per cent each.

The bill would prevent organization hereafter of national banks having a minimum capital stock of less than $50,000. It would prohibit the payment of dividends by national banks except upon the basis of surplus. Under the proposed legislation banks would be forced to have a specified surplus, fixed on a sliding scale according to the bank's capitalization, before payment of dividends could be made. The rate of dividends is also fixed.

The bill would require Federal reserve banks to give immediate credit on checks drawn against them by members, but would permit charging the current interest rate until the checks are collected. It would provide that stockholders in national banks can be held responsible for double liability one year, instead of 60 days, after a transfer of stock. It would authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to issue such securities as may be necessary to furnish all or part of the $500,000,000 and would require that the corporation's loans shall be made to the liquidating board without security.

Enactment of such a law would result in our people placing their money in guaranty banks with utmost safety. Depositors must place their money in banks if the banks are to be profitably operated. In no other way can banks loan money to assist in the transaction of the Nation's enterprises. Profits in banking come not from the use of the bank's capital. This constitutes merely a reserve or guarantee to the depositors, but the guaranty is too small to save depositors of a bank which is faced with real difficulties. This has been adequately demonstrated by the history of bank failures in this country throughout the lifetime of the system. It almost invariably happens that the bank's capital goes the same way as the funds placed in safekeeping by the depositors. The money which is actually loaned by the banks, and upon which they make their profit, is the depositors' money. Thus, the arrangement is on face mutually that of accommodation. The chief difference is that the banker takes chances of losing not only his own money but that of his patrons.

The bill is objected to principally because a very small charge would be levied against member banks as a source for building up the reserve fund for guaranty purposes. This objection can be eliminated by allowing member banks to exact a modest charge upon the accounts of depositors. There can be little doubt that depositors would willingly pay a negligible charge for assurance of absolute safety of their funds. It would actually be only an accommodation charge which would be of insignificant proportions in relation to the interest accruing.

From 1914 to 1930 inclusive a total of 5,177 State and private banks failed, while national bank failures totaled but 842. In 1931 of the 2,290 banks failing 1,772 were not members of the Federal reserve system. This implies that Federal supervision of banking is superior in some respects at least to State supervision.

It is pointed out that bank guaranty laws which have been enacted in various States have not proved satisfactory. This is admitted by the most enthusiastic supporters of the plan but reasons for the fact are manifest. The Nebraska law, for example, went into effect in 1911 and was disposed of in 1930 with the guaranty fund in bad shape. From the day that law went into effect until 1920 Nebraska suffered but three bank failures. From 1920 and thereafter the era of overdevelopment coupled with the deflation of agriculture resulted in numerous bank failures. Too many banks had been established on too flimsy foundations. It was a mushroom growth which had its counterpart in most every other State in the Union. The result was the failure of thousands of banks in the United States, particularly in the agricultural areas which were first, worst, and longest affected. Nebraska had its quota of failures but no more than other States in which corresponding conditions prevailed. Thus from 1920 to 1929, inclusive, a total of 273 banks in Nebraska failed. But the important item to be noted is that, whereas the depositors in States without guaranty laws lost their money, either in part or in whole, the depositors in Nebraska lost not one cent. This is the objective of such a law. The protection of the depositors is the end sought. If the banks must fail, whatever may be the cause, the man or woman placing confidence and money in the bank's keeping must be certain to reclaim both.

Such a law would result in confining the number of banks in a given community to the needs of that community. It would restrict the mushroom growth of banking houses which so often portends ultimate disaster. Those supervising the banking system would be extremely chary of issuing charters to institutions if the selected district in the least suggested that banking facilities were already sufficient. The minimum capitalization being raised would certainly prove an effective deterrent to irresponsible parties wishing to establish new banks and would increase the capacity of banks to face difficult times. In this regard it must not be forgotten that in large proportion the banks which failed during the past decade have been those of a small capital stock.

One of the reasons why State guaranty laws have not proven altogether satisfactory is because they embrace too small a district and cover districts which are too often engaged in a single or at least but few lines of industry. Thus, when unfavorable conditions struck these industries, the entire district was affected disadvantageously. The State guaranty system, unable to build up a sufficient reserve against sudden and wholesale shock such as this, was too likely to prove unable to bear the burden.

It is well known that conditions of prosperity are spotted in a country so large as ours. This uneven distribution of prosperity is reflected in a larger proportion of failures in certain districts than others. A national guaranty system, embracing all the districts, would be capable of building up a guaranty fund with the tremendous resources of the country behind it. Such a fund, administered over the entire country, would not be affected to such an extent by purely local or regional disorders in the economic system.

That such a plan is legal in every respect can be adduced from three decisions of the United States Supreme Court specifically finding as constitutional such a scheme of guaranty fund and regulation for banks of the country.

The Steagall bill would create a guaranty fund and provide for the administration of same, not only in the interest of the depositors but also in the interest of the bankers. It would insure depositors against loss of their savings. Money placed in a bank for safekeeping should be inviolate.

Every bank in the country is a creature of Government, State, or Nation. They all operate by permission and the sanction of the Government. So it is the duty of the Government to enact such laws as will protect the depositors when they put their money in a bank created by the Government. This is not a bankers' bill. This is a depositors' bill. For 60 years Congress has legislated for the banks; let us now legislate for the depositors.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when the House adjourns on Friday, May 27, 1932, it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 31, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Mr. HOWARD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEATH OF FORMER MEMBER

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the Associated Press of May 26 made the following announcement:

LINCOLN, NEBR., May 26.—Charles Franklin Reavis, 62 years old, former Representative of the first district of Nebraska, died early to-day at a hospital after a short illness.

Reavis, a Republican, served three terms in the House of Representatives. He resigned in 1922, first year, fourth term, to practice law. In 1924 he was elected a delegate at large from Nebraska to the Republican National Convention, and last month was elected a delegate from the first district to the Chicago convention.

He is survived by his widow and two sons—C. F. Reavis, jr., of New York City, and John W. Reavis, of Cleveland, Ohio. The Hon. C. Frank Reavis was a son of a Nebraska pioneer family and was a native of the city which has been my home for many years. I was personally acquainted with him and his estimable wife, who is also the daughter of one of the first settlers of Falls City, Nebr. He was a man of unusual ability, was recognized as one of the outstanding citizens of the State. He always took an active part in public affairs, as did also his father, who had quite an active part in the organization of the State from a Territory and was active in forming the first constitution of the State.

His untimely death will be a great shock to the people who knew Frank so well, and the sorrow not only goes out to his wife and sons but all who are thoroughly acquainted will join in extending sincere sympathy to his aged mother, who is recognized by all as one of our noble women of Nebraska, and who survives him.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks relative to Indian affairs in Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, in order that the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma may know in what manner I have labored for them as a Member of Congress, I wish to give the following report of my services:

First. I introduced in Congress soon after I became a Member a bill to authorize a sale of the coal lands to the Government at $12,000,000, and while the bill did not pass, it served to direct attention to the rights of the Indians in this matter, and will form the basis for future efforts along that line. These lands are valued at around $9,000,000, and I have insisted that the refusal of the Government to permit the sale of these properties at a time when they could have been sold at a fair value places a double burden on the Government to purchase them at the value the Government has placed upon them.

Second. I worked incessantly in the last Congress on my leased district bill, involving more than $7,000,000, for the western lands taken from the Indians by article 3 of the treaty of 1866, and we passed through Congress the bill authorizing the Indians to sue in the Court of Claims for these lands. This claim has been the subject matter of controversy for three-quarters of a century. It is true that President Hoover vetoed this bill, but the friends of the measure then went to work and procured the passage through the Senate of the resolution by which the Court of Claims is to give an expression to the Congress on the merits of the resolution. The Attorney General of the United States filed a motion to dismiss this resolution, and the Court of Claims has recently overruled this motion.

Third. I have aided and supported at all times the attorneys for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in getting reports from the departments and in pushing forward their work in connection with the cases now pending in the Court of Claims in which the Indians are seeking to recover judgments on all cases in which suits have been filed in that court. These suits embrace about 15 distinct subject matters and involve more than $30,000,000. Whether they win will, of course, depend on the view the court ultimately takes of the cases.

Fourth. I have succeeded in getting Jones and Wheelock Academies, in the Choctaw Nation, and Carter Seminary, in the Chickasaw Nation, taken care of by the Federal Government, so that all funds for the maintenance of those dian schools are now coming from the Federal Treasury and not from the Indians.

Fifth. I have aided in getting $400,000 in reimbursements to the State for nontaxable Indian lands. When I came to Congress the State was receiving $250,000 for nontaxable Indian lands, but that appropriation has been increased until it is now $400,000 per year, having been increased $150,000.

Sixth. I was instrumental in getting passed through this Congress a bill providing the terms under which the coal lands may be leased in the future.

Seventh. Contrary to what some believe, the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians have but little money to their credit; however, in 1929 I secured from the Indian Bureau a $10 per capita payment for the Choctaws—a total of about $210,000. The Chickasaws did not have sufficient funds to justify a payment. There is at this time to the credit of the Choctaws $111,184.08 and to the Chickasaws $1,262.42, not enough to justify the expense of a per capita payment. However, with the sale of the coal property, the settlement of the leased-district claim, and settlement of other cases filed by tribal attorneys and special attorneys in the Court of Claims, there will be millions to the credit of the tribes. That is what must be done before tribal affairs can be wound up, and that is what I am striving to do.

Eighth. I have labored at all times with an earnest desire to aid the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations and the individual members thereof in all matters in which they were interested, either in Congress or before the departments. I feel that I have made substantial progress. The leased district controversy was resurrected from the grave and given the form of life. It is now in the courts, and I feel that this is an outstanding accomplishment. I may not succeed in getting Congress to take over the coal land, the sole remaining asset of any considerable value, but I have been pressing the claims of the Indians, and if I am permitted to do so, I intend to continue my efforts in behalf of these people.

OFFICE EFFICIENCY

The sharp criticism about congressional family favoritism is no doubt justified in some cases, but it can not in any way apply to my office. Mrs. Cartwright not only works full time but the salary which she actually earns is paid to other employees in my office in my earnest endeavor to keep up with the heavy correspondence, and give the best possible service to the people of my district.

The law governing a Congressman's office force provides that only two can be placed on the pay roll, but in no way designates who those two shall be. No two clerks could possibly do the work in my Washington office.

When I first came to Congress I secured a capable, experienced secretary who could handle the people's needs in governmental matters without wasting two or three years' of time and money in learning the work. Thus, I did not deprive the people of my district of efficiency in service that would have come with a new Congressman and inexperienced secretary. This lady is Marion Upshaw, an orphan girl who is now a resident of McAlester, Okla.

The rest of my office force during the present session of Congress consists of Marie Morrow, of Idabel, Okla., full-time stenographer; Jack Harrison, of Mead, Okla., part-time stenographer; Mayo Roberts, of Idabel, Okla., part-time employee; Truman Ward, who, as manager of the majority room, sends out my farmers' bulletin lists, Agricultural Yearbooks, and so forth, and Mrs. Cartwright, who works diligently in my office and who signs for the $175 per month, which is all used to pay these other employees with the exception of Miss Upshaw, who signs for her own salary. I pay from my own pocket for the printing of all the speeches I send out, multigraphing of all my form letters, and for addressing envelopes. I also pay an extra stenographer and office rent in McAlester during the summer.

This is the system I have used ever since I came to Congress. It certainly is no financial gain to me—in fact, we are actually donating Mrs. Cartwright's services free, but it enables me to use several employees during the busy session of Congress.

BIRTH CONTROL

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under the rule, I ask that the bill (H. R. 11082) to amend section 305 (a) of the tariff act of 1930, and sections 211, 245, and 312 of the Criminal Code, as amended, reported adversely by the Ways and Means Committee, be placed on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the bill is referred to the Union Calendar.

H. R. 11499—THE GOLDSBOROUGH BILL

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the bill, H. R. 11499.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill under consideration.

The bill provides in section 2 that the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall be "charged with the duty of making effective" the declared policy that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years 1921–1929, inclusive, "be restored and maintained by the control of the volume of credit and currency."

The report of the Committee on Banking and Currency states that "if the country knew that because of congressional mandate the Federal reserve system was going to raise the price level to the point indicated—confidence among banks and business men would be restored, bank loans would expand, the retailer would buy from the wholesaler, the wholesaler would buy from the manufacturer, the manufacturer from the producer of raw materials, and the masses of the people would find employment so that through buying of securities by the Federal reserve banks and through the restoration of confidence—the normal business activity of the country would very speedily be reestablished."

How simple it all sounds! How unfortunate that this solution has not been thought of before!

I am opposed to the bill, Mr. Speaker, because, in my opinion, it is impossible of execution, is unfair in representation to the American people, and is charged with possible consequences adverse not only to the Treasury and the Federal reserve system, but to the financial position of the country as a whole.

To enact this bill would be to impose upon the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Federal Treasury a duty the execution of which, in my judgment, can not possibly be assured in the manner suggested. Price levels, both domestic and throughout the world, are determined by numerous factors over which these organizations have no control whatsoever. The mandate takes no account of uncontrollable economic forces, of uncontrollable psychological forces. It deals only with the control of the volume of credit and currency. The velocity of its turnover is not considered. It endeavors to deal with fundamental forces by "futile attention to surface effects." The general purpose sought is one to be devoutly desired. The means chosen can at best be but a gesture.

To enact this bill, in my opinion, would be to raise deliberately false hopes in the minds of the American people. The picture painted can not be realized in the manner suggested. It is particularly unfortunate to paint the picture in these difficult times.

To enact this bill, in my judgment, would be unfair to the Federal Reserve Board, to the Federal reserve banks, to the Federal Treasury. The mandate imposed can not possibly be executed by the means prescribed. Each of these organizations therefore will inevitably be placed in the position of failing to perform a duty which has been defined for it by Congress.

A further and more important objection to the bill remains. We have been seeking to maintain the integrity of the national credit. We have been fighting to preserve the confidence at home and abroad upon which that credit is dependent. The enactment of this bill at this time, in my opinion, would carry with it the possibility of severe injury to that confidence. Its enactment at this time with its declared intention of inflation to the extent specified would carry with it, in my judgment, an inducement to the withdrawal of funds by depositors both at home and abroad in amounts which it is impossible to estimate. The experience of Austria, Germany, Great Britain, and, indeed, of our own country during the past summer and autumn should make it unnecessary to emphasize the importance at this time of the maintenance of confidence both at home and abroad in American credit, in American currency.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill.

Hearings on the bill afford no evidence that the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury in respect to the bill was ever obtained or even requested by the committee. It is my understanding, however, that the bill is opposed not only by the Secretary of the Treasury but by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, by other members of the board, and by the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York as well.

Every period of depression brings with it a flood of legislative panaceas. Nothing is more dangerous at such times than unsound legislation threatening credit and currency.

The general purpose underlying the bill is one with which all must sympathize. It calls, however, in my opinion for discretionary action by the Federal reserve authorities, not for mandatory action by the Congress. And, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, the Federal reserve system has been and is doing all that it can at this time in the desired direction.

The decision by the Democratic leaders of the House to bring this measure up under suspension of the rules of the House adds one more matter to the list of those upon which the House has been recently called to act without any possibility of amendment and, in my judgment, after totally inadequate debate. For a measure dealing with a principle of such outstanding importance to every individual in America this procedure, Mr. Speaker, seems to be indefensible.

THE STEAGALL BILL

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, having been deprived of an opportunity to express my opinion against the Steagall bill passed this afternoon without a yea-and-nay vote, I wish to make the statement that I voted against the bill.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to me to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Illinois, the majority leader?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will.

Mr. MICHENER. May I ask the majority leader what the program will be for Tuesday, as a number of Members want to go away?

Mr. RAINEY. There will be some reports from the Committee on Rules, and after those are finished I thought we might have general debate, if anybody wants to speak.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Michigan is familiar with the fact that the Committee on Rules has reported out several resolutions that have not been acted upon, and the majority leader and the Speaker, in their anxiety to get matters cleaned up, thought that we might take Tuesday to get rid of those rules.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman state what the rules are?

Mr. BANKHEAD. One is the Shannon resolution and the other involves the airship amendment to the maritime law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And there are two rules pending on the immigration question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and we want to get rid of those.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And to one of those, relating to the fathers and mothers, the majority of the Immigration Committee will undertake to offer an amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman will not be deprived of his right on that. Another matter is the resolution sponsored by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MICHENER. Then I understand we will start with the rules from the Rules Committee, and afterwards indulge in some debate.

Mr. RAINEY. Oratorical ethics. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further.

Mr. Speaker, the world has reached an economic crisis such as it has never known before, and included in that economic crisis is the United States of America to-day the richest, most-favored nation on the globe. The reasons for this economic cycle, or depression, have been accumulating for the past 30 years. If radical and sensible measures to remedy the downward course of this depression are not taken, another war, or a wave of sporadic revolutions, already evidenced in Central and South American Republics, will become world wide.

Fear and greed are the underlying causes of this depression. They were the underlying causes of the great war. They will be the underlying causes of the next great war unless those who now are actuated by fear and greed—mostly fear at this time—awaken and see the way out.

Evolution of commerce and industry, expansion and improvement of transportation and communication facilities all have for the past 30 years been bringing together, hooking up more closely, all the countries of the world into one vast structure more rigid, more closely united, each part or country to all the rest, than ever before in all history.

The war increased this interdependence of nations one upon another and, finally, through our enormous public and private loans and investments to other nations—aggregate governmental and private loans and investments being at this time about thirty and one-half billions—we became the pivotal point, or the creditor nation of the world. As a consequence of this new relation, the United States also became the pivotal point of all economic shocks throughout the world.

Some nation has been in an economic depression at nearly every point in history. But previous to the unification of interests and activities into this great world structure of nations the picture was one of many small structures standing in a world of activity. When an economic shock affected one structure, or nation, the others were merely shaken slightly. While one nation was in an economic depression other nations around it were prosperous and were able to go to the financial assistance of the stricken nation. After the structure became solidified into what constitutes, economically at least, one vast rigid edifice instead of many individual and separate structures, any economic shock to any substantial member part of this edifice, so closely knit by industrial, political, commercial, financial, and social interests, must of necessity go through the whole structure with severity. And that is what has happened, largely as a result of the World War.

We are to-day most concerned with the question of recovery as soon as possible, and many remedies are proposed.

One view is cancellation of the so-called war debts, which really are "after the war debts."

If those debts should be canceled, what next may we expect? Foreign nations owe our private investors nearly $19,000,000,000. Will they then call upon American citizens to cancel these also? We are urged to cancel the war debts in order to expand our foreign commerce. If our past commercial relations with other countries is any index of what we may expect in the future, it must be recognized that not more than 7 per cent of any prosperity we may have is to be gained from our trade with them. In the past during peace times we have never sold in foreign markets more than 7 per cent of our products. In 1931 it was only 3¾ per cent, as compared to 1927. This means that not less than 93 per cent of our markets, 93 per cent of our prosperity, is right here in our own country. It is ours to have and to hold, if we are wise. It can, in a large measure at least, be with us always, if we will properly adjust our economic affairs, so that such blows as fall upon our national shoulders in the future shall fall upon all alike, and that such prosperity as comes to us shall, in a generous measure, reach into every home in the land.

Another remedy proposed is the remonetization of silver, with a doubling of the purchasing power of India, China, and the other silver-using countries.

Another suggestion is the repeal of the eighteenth amendment—in order to create additional work and cause to flow into the Government Treasury the enormous sums of money now flowing into the hands of organized racketeers and gangsters.

Still another is to develop in every possible way our foreign markets, particularly in Central and South America. In this connection it may be said that Mr. V. W. O'Brien, a friend of mine in my home city, has advanced some new and, in my opinion, some very valuable ideas on the proposition. These ideas will some day command the serious attention of thoughtful citizens interested in the development of our foreign commerce.

Others advocate a system of intergovernmental tariff accords. Still others preach liberalization of the antitrust laws.

We are now trying to balance the Budget and to curtail, as far as practicable, the expenses of Government.

All of these suggestions may have merit but, after all, many of them are directed to the rehabilitation of our foreign markets rather than to the resuscitation of our greatest market, which is at home.

Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent to extend as a part of my remarks, an excerpt from brochures published by Young & Ottley, and also excerpts from an article by Mr. John P. Frey of the American Federation of Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Unfortunately there is and has been a very strong tendency on the part of business leaders, banking groups, and men holding important key positions in Congress and the administration to take the attitude publicly that "things are not so bad," but privately to admit to their conferees that they are quite worried about the fundamental readjustments that are of necessity still to come. They repeatedly say, privately, that the more important economic factors are still unfavorable, but that the only factors that can be mentioned to the public are the few minor favorable factors.

The reason for this situation is clear. These men we speak of are all trying to do a good job. They realize that in order to help work out the readjustments still to come, they must maintain the good will of the people in order to obtain the necessary support and coordinated action on measures still to be proposed.

We have sufficient confidence in the good judgment of the masses of the people to believe they do not need to be molly-coddled. We believe that if the present economic problems are clearly and frankly put before them, bringing out the true facts of the situation with its serious implications, they will respond with level-headed support. We believe that whatever objections exist on the part of the people of the United States to necessary economic readjustments, they are not the result of stubborn class hatred nor of isolationist bigotry, but are due rather to a sheer misunderstanding of the problems involved—a misunderstanding which is no fault of their own but rather the result of the almost absolute lack of courage on the part of those individuals who really know the truth.

The captain of a ship in a heavy storm does not tell his men that there is no storm. The strongest desire of men in a crisis is to know what it is that menaces them so that they can do whatever is necessary and be prepared. We do not believe that the people of the United States or of other countries have lost their capacity for meeting difficult situations.

The United States would not have progressed as far as it has in the last 150 years if the majority of the people were unreasoning bigots. The majority of the people are capable of understanding what is their welfare and what is the economic welfare of the country, if the economic facts, minus half-baked opinions, are placed before them with a true statement of the problems involved. If the business and political leaders of the country really believe that the reconstruction measures which they have in mind are not primarily in the interests of any one group or class, but are really of vital importance to the entire economic community, then those readjustments should be openly discussed, because it is only in this way that economic cooperation will be gained. (Brochure, vol. 1, March 12, 1932, by Young & Ottley (Inc)., of 122 East Forty-second Street, New York, brokers, business analysts, and economists.)

Day after day we have been told by business, financial, and political leaders that fear, otherwise loss of confidence, is the basic and almost the whole cause of the continued depression. Fear of what? Loss of confidence in what?

The thing man fears most is something he does not understand. The thing he is most afraid of is the unknown. So, then, the fear which holds us in this depression is simply lack of understanding of what has caused the depression, of what will rescue us from it, and of how bad the future may become before things begin to get better. If the people understood these things, they would not fear. They might be angry at some groups or class because that group or class has exploited the people. Well and good. But if the people clearly understood the causes for this depression or how bad it is or how long it may last, and above all of what they can do to rescue themselves from it, everybody would go to work heart and mind to adopt and put into effect the remedy.

What have the people lost confidence in? Mostly in their ability to hold their present jobs or to get another one if they lose the one they have; or, having had no job in a long time, that they will never have another; or, as is the case with the farmers who now have to sell their products far below the cost of production, that prices on the things they have to sell will never rise to a profitable level; or of proper returns from investments with those who have to live on the income from the same.

Also, due to the appalling number of bank failures, the people lost confidence in the banks, while the bankers lost confidence in business, and everyone began to hoard every dollar he could lay his hands on, spending as little as he could and saving the rest, because he does not know how long the depression may last or how bad it may become. The banker hoarded his credit because he felt that the fears of his community might at any moment express themselves in loss of confidence in his bank and an overwhelming demand for deposits, so he ceased lending and began to hoard. The inevitable result of this fear and this hoarding was and is that business remains at a standstill, sinking deeper and deeper into the morass of depression.

The economic plight of other countries, plus the contraction of credits brought on by the attack of industrial, commercial, and financial indigestion we imposed on ourselves by overinflation and oversalesmanship, plus the labor-displacing technological advancements in industry, so unwisely managed as to produce a serious maladjustment of work, resulted in 1929 in the downward plunge the world, including this country, took from the heights of artificial prosperity into the depths of the depression we now are in. The all-important question is whether we have ceased plunging downward or whether we are still in that downward flight, and, if the latter is the case, how we are to arrest the downward spiral and turn about to spiral upward to a sound economic level again.

We have vainly tried nearly every remedy but the sound, sensible, most efficacious, the fundamental one. The time has arrived when we must frankly face the facts and adopt the proper and only sound measure of relief if we are to recover and avoid a progressively more desperate condition of affairs, which, carried far enough and long enough, will inevitably involve us in economic chaos, riot, and worse.

The foundation of all economic structure is consuming power. Without people to consume or to use things there could be no reason for producing those things. People without the means to buy things—or without purchasing power—would be the same, economically, as being without people to consume things. Therefore, this base line or foundation of the economic structure is consuming power, and consuming power is made up of people—plus their purchasing power.

Resting upon and regulated by consuming power is producing power. Producing power is composed of manufacturing capacity plus distribution facilities. Without the manufacturing capacity—the power to make or to grow things—we would have no need of distribution facilities such as railroads, automobiles, ships, and so forth. Without those distribution facilities the capacity to manufacture would be paralyzed, because the things made could not be delivered to the people needing or desiring them.

Resting upon these two base lines, consuming power and producing power, is financial power or credits. Financial power is composed of confidence, which we call credit.

Transportation is the means of transferring things from where they are to a point where they are of more use. Money, or credit, is the means by which the ownership of things is transferred from where it is to where those things will be more useful.

Therefore, then, the economic structure is made up of consuming power at the bottom, upon which rests producing power, and upon which, in turn, rests financing power.

The greatest excuse for financing power is because of some operation or activity taking place between consuming power and producing power. If there were no organized producing power, everybody would produce his own things, such as clothes, boots, farm products, lumber, and so forth, just as the early pioneers did, and there would be little need for any financing power except a small amount of token currency or pocket money.

If there were no consuming power, there could not be any organized producing power or industry, and therefore no need for financing power.

It becomes clear that as population increases or decreases the volume of production must, to be economically sound, increase or decrease proportionately, and the volume of financing power or credits must correspondingly increase or decrease with the fluctuating activity of exchange between the consuming power and the producing power. If a third of our population were to be wiped out by an epidemic, industry and finance would have to readjust their volume downward by one-third. If one-third of our population lost its purchasing power—and it has—then industry and finance would have to readjust their volumes downward by one-third—and they have.

The moment the volume of finance or credit departs upward or downward from its proper parallel line in relation to the other two lines of consuming power and producing power, inflation or deflation has begun to operate. The moment producing power departs from its proper parallel line in relation to consuming power and financial power, upward or downward, overproduction or underproduction begins.

The moment consuming power departs from its healthy, normal consuming capacity plus its purchasing capacity, upward or downward, it is in trouble. Overconsumption plus undercapacity to pay means industrial and financial indigestion. And that is what happened. Why?

Because during the 1920's the financial power departed from its base lines of consuming power and producing power upward into speculative levels, or inflation of credits. Financial power then coaxed producing power, or industry, which during the war had already greatly overexpanded by means of inflated credits, to still further overexpand plants or producing capacity. Industry then found that it had no more people, relatively speaking, to whom to sell, and the people had no more consuming capacity nor capacity to pay than they had before the inflation, so what must industry do? Financial power and producing power invented the installment system, plus high-powered salesmanship, plus intensive advertising, plus every other device calculated to induce people to buy on credit twice or three times as much as they had capacity to consume or to pay for. They were induced to buy two of this and three of that on credit, better homes than they could afford, more and better of everything that they needed or could pay for, and thus economic indigestion was caused in consuming power. Then the financial power saw the danger and started to be afraid.

It began to "become liquid," which meant that banks, recognizing a condition of overinflation and overproduction, called in their loans or credits. This action left producing power, or industry, without means to continue to manufacture and to distribute its products. It turned off workers. Everybody grew fearful. Hoarding began. Trade volumes fell. The stock market collapsed. Stocks and bonds lost their earning power—interest and dividends—and people began to unload their stocks and bonds. Rail loadings fell off and transportation facilities lost business. More employees were laid off, wages were reduced, and purchasing power was thus further reduced, and so downward we have been spiraling.

Now, about 80 per cent of our population is composed of wage earners, farmers, and other workers, including salaried employees and dependents of them all. Therefore, 80 per cent, relatively speaking, of the market for production resided in these individuals. The man who worked in the factory was the factory's ultimate customer. So when the factory cut its employees' wages or laid them off, it was actually reducing or destroying the purchasing power of its own customers. And that is exactly what has happened—what has been happening for several years.

The high wage standard in the United States is admitted by every authority to have resulted in a high living standard, which in turn resulted in a high level of prosperity; a high level of consuming power resulted in a high level of producing power, both agricultural and industrial, with good dividends, and a high level of financing power with good interest returns.

It must be obvious that if a high level of wages meant a high level of living standards, and if a high-level living standard meant a high level of profitable agricultural and industrial production, and if these two together meant a high level of financial volume with profitable interest returns, then to depart from a high-living level by reduction of wages must mean to depart from a high level of profitable production or credit volume. And that is what has happened.

Conversely, it must be true that if the way back to prosperity over a given period is to reduce wages—otherwise purchasing power—10 per cent, then we could recover prosperity five times faster by reducing wages 50 per cent. Nobody could believe that.

And it must be true that if the way back to prosperity is by reducing wages and salaries, then the way to keep that prosperity, after having recovered it, would be to continue to keep wages and salaries down to low levels. Nobody believes that.

Now let us see what has been happening over the past several years and thus get a clue to the causes for the depression and some indication of what will cure it and start us spiraling back upward toward a relative normal, stabilized level of prosperity, comfort, and happiness.

John P. Frey, secretary-treasurer Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, in an article in the American Federationist for July, 1931, has put the whole situation very clearly. He said, in part:

> The six years following 1922 were, in many respects, the most prosperous the United States has experienced. Wealth was created much more rapidly than ever before. Though agriculture did not fare so well, industry, commerce, and banking enjoyed astounding prosperity. The volume and the value of manufactured products increased enormously.
> In 1914 the value of our manufactured products was approximately $24,000,000,000. In 1921 it was forty-four billions. In 1923 it was sixty-one billions, while for 1929 it was sixty-nine billions.
> It is true that there has been a change in the purchasing power of the dollar between 1914 and 1929, but this change in money value is but a fraction of the difference between the total value of manufactured products in 1914 as compared with those for 1929.
> As the great annual increase in the national wealth from 1922 to 1929 was due principally to the wealth created by industry rather than by agriculture, a review of the causes for this increase will assist in a clearer understanding of the principal reason for the depression which began with the fall of 1929 * * *.
> It was in the United States that mass production had its origin. It is this American system of production, made possible through the application of more practical and scientific methods than are to be found elsewhere, that we owe the astounding annual increase in the value of manufactured products during the period under consideration.
> New conceptions relative to the methods of manufacturing products began to indicate themselves effectively some 30 years ago. What was termed "scientific management" began to assert its influence. The chemist, the mechanical, the electrical, and other technically trained engineers began to emerge from the laboratory and enter the workshops for the purpose of directly applying their skill and technical knowledge to every form and method and system of production then in existence. * * *
> There was a most rapid development in the invention of automatic and semiautomatic machinery. The use of machinery was greatly increased. The power applied to the operation of machinery per workman was doubled and trebled. Thirty years ago it was less than 2 horsepower per workman in the manufacturing industries. In 1929 this had increased to 5 horsepower per workman. * * *
> Mass production has been accompanied by a most rapid increase in the per capita volume of production in our industries. Federal statistics indicate that during the eight years ending in 1928 over 925,000 workmen were eliminated from our manufacturing industries, some 800,000 from agriculture, and approximately 250,000 from railway transportation. Yet with this greatly reduced army of workers manufacturing, agriculture, and railway transportation were of considerably greater volume than seven years before.
> It is this constantly increasing production per wage earner which has made labor costs so low in our country. In a number of our industries the labor cost in the United States has been lower than in other countries although the dollar-and-cent wage has been considerably higher.
> The American freight train hauls several thousand tons more than those in other countries. The American agricultural worker, particularly in the wheat fields, sows and harvests the wheat at a considerably lower labor cost per bushel than in those countries where coolie labor receives 9 and 10 cents per day.
> The American coal miner, working under the union wage scale, receives a considerably higher dollar-and-cent wage per day than the coal miners of any other country. But the average output per workman in the American coal mines is well over 4½ tons per day, while in England it is but a slight fraction over 1 ton, and in several of the continental countries of Europe less than 1 ton per capita.
> The predominance of American industry in the use of machinery is indicated in the following statistics giving the value of the machinery absorbed per year per capita in certain large countries.
> In 1913 the United States absorbed $15 per capita in machinery. This amount had arisen to $23 in 1925.
> In 1913 Great Britain had absorbed $5 per capita in machinery. This had increased to $10 in 1925.
> In 1913 Germany had absorbed $7 per capita in machinery. This had increased to $9 in 1925.
> In 1913 the machinery absorbed per capita in India amounted to 10 cents. This had increased to 17 cents in 1925.
> In China the amount absorbed per capita for machinery in 1913 was 14 cents. In 1925 this was reduced to 5 cents.
> In some of our American industries the per capita production since the war has been increased many hundred per cent. Where automatic machinery has almost wholly replaced hand labor, the output per workman has been increased several thousand times. Even in such an industry as agriculture, so our highest authorities inform us, the agricultural workers' output has been increased approximately 300 per cent since 1900.
> Volume and value being taken into consideration, it is found that many American workers have been paid a lower dollar-and-cent wage for the volume of their output than the workmen of a number of the other large industrial countries.
> Although the Nation had contracted a debt of $25,000,000,000 as a result of the World War, the burden apparently placed no check upon the rapid growth of national wealth. The national income increased to such an extent that Americans, while amply financing our industries and commerce, were able to lend some seventeen (now nearly nineteen) billion dollars to foreign individuals and foreign countries, in addition to the national loans to the allied nations.
> Although a most serious depression has afflicted us for 18 months (now nearly three years) our banks contain more money than ever before, and this is being lent on good securities at the lowest rates of interest in our history. There is no famine of money in the bankers' vaults, although industry is seriously depressed and at least six (now eight) million wage earners are wholly unemployed, with a large army of others employed part time. * * *
> The depression came at a time when the production of wealth in the United States had reached a pinnacle never before attained. The foodstuffs grown were greater in volume than ever before, the banks held more wealth. Even now, with stark poverty facing millions of wage earners, we find our grain elevators bursting with wheat and the bankers' vaults congested with money which they are vainly seeking to invest.
> There are most valid reasons for believing that the present depression was caused by the economically unsound policies which governed the captains of industry and finance during the so-called years of prosperity, 1923–1929. It was their incapacity to understand the economic results which must follow the business policies they were carrying out. It was their lack of understanding or their avaricious desire to acquire fabulous wealth in the shortest time possible, or a combination of these, which brought about the calamity of the depression which now presses so destructive a burden upon at least one-fifth of the Nation's wage earners.

If we are to more clearly understand what was transpiring after 1922, it must be kept in mind that our export business never has supplied a market for the great bulk of our industrial production. * * *

From the days of the Civil War our total exports, including agricultural as well as manufactured products, averaged approximately 7 per cent of the whole. Our export of manufactured goods was increasing to an encouraging extent before the World War, but the enormous national debts incurred by European countries, their dominions and their colonies, led each to build up their manufactures as rapidly as possible. Most of them hoped, in addition to manufacturing for their own home market, to find in an export business the means of securing wealth with which to pay their debts.

The competition of manufactured goods in the world's markets became more keen. One effect of this world-wide condition has been to handicap our Nation's export business; and this handicap has been increased not a little, so far as our manufacturing industries are concerned, by the establishing of American branch plants in foreign countries and the enormous loans made by Americans privately to build up the business of foreign manufacturers. * * *

As our industries recovered from the depression of 1921, there were some outstanding facts with which our captains of industry and finance were familiar. The American system of industrial labor mass production had firmly established itself. But it was apparent that the full results of the application of power, machinery, and scientific direction of industry had scarcely accomplished more than to open the doors to the still greater efficiency of methods and processes which would be developed.

The chemists, the metallurgists, the technical and production engineers, were constantly improving upon the system of production they had established. This led to that constant elimination of workmen which has been called technological unemployment. Unless new industries, comparable in a way to the development of the automobile, were created, it would be impossible for a large number of workmen already displaced and to be displaced in the future to find unemployment.

It is true that the production of automobiles created new employments, and that larger numbers displaced found work in personal service and professional entertainment. It was equally true that a large number of the skilled workers eliminated from the manufacturing industries and railroads had been unable, even when they did secure other employment, to secure wages equal to those formerly received. The skilled worker, eliminated even in early middle life, can not acquire the same degree of skill in some new industry which will bring equally high wages.

There existed another well-established condition vitally affecting American industry—the growing difficulty of increasing our export of manufactured goods. Our business leaders had no reason for believing in 1922 that there would be any material increase in the volume of our exports. It was evident to those having control of our industries that approximately 95 per cent of our manufactured goods must be sold in the American market. They were also aware that approximately 80 per cent of our population is composed of wage earners and their dependents.

It did not require exceptional intelligence to realize that the capacity of the American wage earners to purchase what was being produced depended upon their real wage, the purchasing capacity of the dollars and cents in the pay envelope. If industry and commerce should fail to pay wages having a sound relation to the wealth being created, then, in addition to injuring the wage earners, industry and commerce itself would be seriously and perhaps dangerously affected.

It was the failure of our captains of industry and finance to be influenced by the evident economic facts which created the disastrous injury to the market in which their goods must be sold, and which, more than anything else, brought about the depression which overwhelmed the country in the winter of 1929. * * *

There have been periods when our bankers were able to make their business a most profitable one, but never was there such a gathering of profits as during the years which followed 1922. In December of that year the capital of the banks, members of the Federal reserve, was $1,940,000,000. This capital in 1929 had increased to $2,757,000,000. Their surplus at the end of 1922 was $1,625,000,000. At the close of December, 1929, this had increased to $2,864,000,000. Their undivided profits when 1922 closed were $797,000,000. The undivided profits had increased to $1,086,000,000 at the end of 1929.

This financial record indicates the great increase of capital acquired by the member banks of the Federal reserve, who represent approximately 70 per cent of the Nation's banking. This accumulation of reserves was paralleled by the net addition to their profits, which in 1922 amounted to $299,000,000 and in 1929 reached the huge sum of $556,000,000.

This period of rapidly increasing annual profits was accompanied by equally satisfactory dividends to the holders of the banks' stocks. In 1922 the fortunate holders of these stocks were paid $246,000,000 in dividends. Dividend payments increased from year to year, and in 1929 $408,000,000 were paid in dividend checks. The total deposits in these banks in 1922 was $27,288,000,000; in 1929 they had increased to $38,014,000,000. * * *

During the period following 1922 the annual value of manufactured products increased enormously, but not so rapidly as the bankers' profits. The total value of products manufactured in 1923 was $60,529,000,000. In 1927 our manufacturing industries did better, for the total value for that year was $62,718,000,000. This increase in the total value of manufactured products was eclipsed by the two years which followed; years during which rapidly added impetus was given to the causes which are principally responsible for the present depression. In 1929 the total value of manufactured products mounted to $69,417,000,000.

Keeping in mind the fact that the home market was the one upon which our American manufacturers were forced to depend for the sale of 95 per cent of their products, it is interesting to compare the total volume of wages paid in the manufacturing industries with the value of manufactured products.

In 1923 the total wages were $11,007,000,000. Although the value of manufactured products had increased in 1925 more than $2,000,000,000 above 1923, the total volume of wages in the manufacturing industries that year was less than in 1923, and the same is true for 1927. In 1929 there was an increase, for $11,421,000,000 were paid in wages.

Although the total value of manufactured products was practically $9,000,000,000 more in 1929 than in 1923, the total volume of wages paid in these industries in 1929 was but little more than those paid out in 1923.

Unless there had been an enormous increase in the wealth flowing to the agricultural population, and a similar great increase in the purchasing capacity of those employed outside of the manufacturing industries, it is evident that the mass of the people were much less able to purchase what was being produced in the United States in 1929 than they had been in 1923.

While the total volume of wages in the manufacturing industries was but a trifle more in 1929 than in 1922, all wages were less in 1929 than in 1926.

How did the owners of stocks, the captains of industry and finance fare during this period? In 1922, the total of dividends paid by all corporations was $930,648,000; in 1929, $3,478,000,000 were paid in dividends. Bondholders and the banks fared as well, for all corporations paid $2,469,000,000 as interest in 1922, while in 1929, the interest payments amounted to $7,588,000,000.

The failure of industry and commerce to pay wages in proportion to the wealth being created, resulted in a serious depression, or lack of consuming power, in the very market in which the manufacturing industries were compelled to depend for the purchase of 95 per cent of their product.

It is true that our American industries were engaged in turning out producers', as well as consumers' goods, but this fact does not change the economic unbalance which resulted through the failure to pay an economically sound wage. * * *

Mr. Frey shows in a chart accompanying his study that from 1899 to 1929 the workers' producing power increased about 65 or 66 per cent, while his pay in real wages (purchasing power of dollar wages) increased in the same period only about 23 or 24 per cent. Therefore, while his production per man increased 65 or 66 per cent, his ability to buy what he made actually increased only 23 or 24 per cent.

In another chart it is shown that in the period from 1899 to 1929 the annual value of manufactured products rose from about eleven billions in 1899 to $69,417,000,000 in 1929, while annual wages in manufacturing industries rose from about three and one-third billions in 1899 to only $11,421,000,000. In other words, while the annual production in 1929 had risen to approximately six and one-half times that of 1899, the 1929 real wages were less than four times as much as they were in 1899.

Another chart shows that from 1913 to 1929 hourly dollar wages rose about 132 per cent but that real wages, based on the purchasing power of the dollar, rose in the same period only about 40 per cent.

In a study of wage earnings it is necessary to bear in mind that a change in the amount of money received by the workers per unit of time is of significance to them only in relation to what those wages will buy. It is the real value of wages or earnings that determines whether a change in the money earnings has improved or lowered the financial position of the worker. For this purpose indexes of real earnings are computed generally by dividing the indexes of money or dollar earnings by the index of the cost of living.

For example, if the weekly earnings increase 20 per cent between two given dates, and the prices of commodities and the cost of services that enter into a wage earner's living expenses also increase 20 per cent, no benefit accrues to the workers. If the cost of living rises less than 20 per cent, the wage earners are in a more favorable financial position. If the cost of living rises more than 20 per cent, the wage earner is in a less favorable financial position. That is what constitutes the difference between dollar wages, so called, and real wages, which is purchasing power.

So we see that the real purchasing power of 80 per cent of our customers was not keeping pace with the increase in the production. Another chart included in the article quoted shows this very clearly in another way. From 1900 to 1929 our population had increased only slightly more than 60 per cent, or a fraction more than 2 per cent a year, while the volume of products per annum had increased at the peak of 1929 about 250 per cent, and the value of those products had increased per annum about 650 per cent. So population increase was not keeping pace with manufacturing increase.

Of another chart showing the increase of total incomes of all individuals, the value of manufactured products, the volume of wages of all wage earners, and the salaries of all salaried employees, Mr. Frey says:

The most startling feature of chart No. 7 is the curve showing the volume of wages for all employees, which includes all wage earners in addition to those employed in the manufacturing industries. Here we find that, after increasing slightly from 1925, they remained at the same volume for a year and then after 1927 began to go downward, so that while the total national income and the total value of manufactured products were rapidly increasing, the total volume of wages paid in the United States actually decreased. It is not surprising that, with this reduced capacity to buy, the mass of the people were unable to purchase the goods from which the investors, the banks, and the captains of industry had been reaping such enormous profits.

Chart No. 7, in conjunction with chart No. 6, helps to visualize the statement recently made by Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, that real wages increased 13 per cent from 1921 to 1929, but that during this period the return to industrialists grew 72 per cent, while the gain in dividends on industrials and rails increased 256 per cent.

The outstanding economic facts of the so-called period of prosperity from 1922 to the end of 1929 present a depressing picture of economically unsound and destructive business policies. There is little if anything in the basic statistics to encourage or create confidence in the future. It is apparent that during this period the American wage earner was considered almost wholly as a producer of wealth, and that he was disregarded as the major consumer of the Nation's products.

In 1922 it was known that we could hope to export little more than 5 per cent of our manufactured products and that the bulk of our manufacturing industries must depend for their market upon the 80 per cent of the population represented by the wage earners and their dependents. Yet a business policy was carried out which could have no other effect than to steadily weaken the consuming market.

There are basically important moral and social questions involved in the just distribution of the annual wealth created, which must be considered in connection with the national welfare, but at present we are attempting to deal only with the economic factors.

The business practices carried out during the period under consideration, instead of solidly building up the Nation's prosperity, were in reality tearing it down, destroying it, for they were basically unsound.

Many of those who are responsible for the catastrophe because they failed to pay an economically sound wage are now informing the American public that the only hope of recovery is to still further reduce the total volume of wages. They are like the farmer, who, believing that his horse was eating too much gradually reduced the daily ration to the vanishing point, and then remarked to a neighbor, "I had just brought the rations down to the limit when the danged brute laid down and died."

After 1922 the nourishing blood of the national wealth filled the arteries of industry and commerce, but the financial heart, instead of pumping it throughout our economic system, created congestion. Instead of nourishing the Nation it caused a stoppage, the partial paralysis which we call the depression.

Our captains of industry and finance now find themselves much in the position of Midas—smothered by the hoards of gold they had heaped up. If they alone were the present sufferers because of their economic shortsightedness, there would be a large measure of justice in their situation; but their fatal economic policies have wrought havoc and spread suffering to millions of American wage earners and their dependents.

The period from 1922 was marked by the extension of combinations in finance, industry, and commerce. Mergers, trusts, and holding corporations not only increased rapidly in number but in their wide control. Certainly the period was not one in which sound economic policies guided those in control of the Nation's activities. What occurred bears much more resemblance to the law of the jungle than to the sane management of business by those responsible for its development.

The Nation fervently desires a return to prosperity, but if the improvement, which must come one of these days, is to be featured by the same unsound distribution of wealth which prevailed after 1922, then instead of prosperity we will be entering into another period during which the seeds of future business catastrophe will be sown. * * *

Having thus looked into the causes of the condition in which we find ourselves, we come to the question of what to do.

That we are in the midst of what is known as the "long type" of depression similar to that of 1873–1879 is now evident. As has been said, the question is, are we still plunging downward to further bank failures and bankruptcies, further wage reduction, further unemployment, further privation and suffering, further drain upon the charitable institutions, and finally, to rioting or the dole, or can we arrest the downward plunge and start to spiral upward again?

Another set of charts published by Young & Ottley (vol. 2) are significant. One chart shows (Chart No. VII) that from 1929 up to March 1 of this year employment had decreased roughly about 30 per cent while pay rolls have decreased about 55 per cent, showing the effect of wage cutting in addition to lay-offs. This means that if the workers had had no reserve savings, the purchasing power of 80 per cent of our market would have been 55 per cent destroyed. But savings held the purchasing power up for a while so that now business activity is down roughly 40 to 45 per cent.

Commodity prices have decreased since 1929 by 35 per cent, farm products by 55 per cent, and yet the purchasing power of the dollar has risen over the United States only 20.5 per cent.

It would seem at first glance that if commodities have gone down 35 per cent the purchasing power of the dollar should have increased in ratio. But the difference is in services and other items (besides foodstuffs and clothing), which have not decreased so rapidly. The total cost of living, including all items and services, at January 1 of this year was only 17 per cent lower than December, 1929. (National Industrial Conference Board (Inc.), New York, "The cost of living in the United States in 1931," p. 4.)

So, then, we find that instead of the purchasing power of the dollar having increased 45 or 50 per cent since 1929, as we are told frequently, the fact is that to-day's dollar will buy only 20.5 cents more than did the 1929 dollar. (Ibid., p. 49.) The cost of living to-day, despite the 17 per cent drop, is still 34 per cent above the level of July, 1914, so the cost of living has not gone down to pre-war levels as we are so frequently told. (Ibid., p. 4.)

It is estimated that about 8,000,000 people are unemployed in the United States at this time. Whether that estimate is correct no man can say. It is also estimated that about 12,000,000 more are on reduced time or reduced pay. Just how accurate that figure is no man can say. One close student of economics, basing his calculations on reduced business activity, reduced pay rolls, reduced employment, and increased hoarding, estimates, probably correctly enough, that about 40,000,000 of our population are without any income, although they still have some consuming power—through charity or savings.

This economist disagrees with some other authorities as to the actual number of citizens whose purchasing power has been cut off through unemployment. Many statements have been made to the effect that because the average number of persons in the family in the United States, as shown by the census of 1930, is 4.1, there are that many persons in the average wage earner's family. This economist points out that this could not possibly be true since the census of 1930 shows that the number of persons normally employed at gainful occupations in the United States was 48,832,589. (New York World Almanac, 1932, p. 44, 1st col.)

Based on this number, to say that three other persons are dependent upon the worker would require a population of 195,330,356 persons, whereas the census of 1930 disclosed for this country a population of only 122,775,046. Therefore, allowing for a leisure class, an average of two and one-half persons to the wage-earning family—the worker, his wife, and half a child, so to speak—would show a population dependent upon gainful employment to be the number of workers multiplied by 2½, or 122,081,472.

But considering the reduction in pay rolls, in employment, and so forth, it is safe to say that, roughly, one-third of our population, or 40,000,000, have, in effect, lost their entire purchasing power and nine-tenths of their consuming power.

Figuring 8,000,000 workers to be entirely unemployed, at two and one-half persons to the family, would give a total of 20,000,000 without income. Added to that, we have a farm population, according to the 1930 census, of 30,477,550. (New York World Almanac, 1932, p. 305.) This population has lost at least half of its purchasing power, which in actual results would equal another 15,000,000 totally without purchasing power. This would bring the total of those without income up to 35,000,000. Then other gainfully employed persons who are on part time or reduced wages or salaries would make up the balance.

This figure of 40,000,000 persons without income or purchasing power agrees with the fall in business, in rail loadings, and so forth, closely enough to make it a good working figure.

It may be fairly assumed that we have a condition in this country which equals one worker in every four being without income or purchasing power, which would mean, roughly, that 25 per cent of our normally gainfully employed are out of employment now.

It must be evident that since at least 93 per cent of our market is within our own country (more than that now), and since more than 80 per cent of our entire population—consumers—is made up of those who normally are gainfully employed and their dependents, that our greatest avenue of recovery must be, not abroad in foreign markets, but at home in our domestic market. Our first concern should be the restoration of that 25 or 30 per cent depleted purchasing power which means that at least that much consuming power at home. How may that be done?

But one possible way is open. That is to get the unemployed back to work. And there is but one economically sound way of restoring these unemployed sufferers to employment, and that is by dividing up the available amount of work.

That means either fewer days a week or fewer hours a day, or both. The fact is that to completely take up the slack that has accumulated and stop the depression immediately it will be necessary to go to a 5-day week with a 6-hour day. Now, what would that mean?

It would mean no reduction in the hourly wage rate; in fact, wages could and should be put back to the 1929 level. But it would mean that each worker now employed would work one-fourth less time and would receive one-fourth less income than he did in 1929 until more prosperous conditions returned. It would mean that men now unemployed would have jobs. It would mean that the purchasing power of all our people, at least to the point where the necessities of life could be had, would be restored. It would mean that the wheels of our factories would necessarily begin to turn to supply the demands of this restored consuming class. It would mean much desired increase in the price of commodities, especially farm products. In short, it would mean a return to better wages and a short cut to normal prosperity.

Now, how would this work out in practice? It simply would mean that there would be a 25 per cent increase in purchasing power of all the people, and temporarily a decrease in the accumulation of savings of 80 per cent of the population, for the wage earner who now makes more than enough to live on comfortably is hoarding the rest of his earnings over and above necessary expenditures. He can not be blamed, for he does not have any assurance that his job or his wage standard will be continued for any given length of time.

It is true, if statistics published in an issue of the American Mercury last year are correct, that the gainfully employed contribute 87 per cent of all charitable funds, so the worker who is now employed is having to give up some of his income to keep his brother worker in idleness, on a starvation basis, in the rôle of beggary, all of which is unsound both economically and sociologically.

It is, of course, impossible to give exact figures for the increase in dollars which would flow directly into our markets at home through adoption of the 5-day-week, 6-hour-day plan. Figured on only a dollar a day basis, which is a most conservative figure, if 40,000,000 people now without purchasing power were given a dollar a day to spend for necessities, this would appear to assure a flow of $40,000,000 a day into commerce and industry, which would equal the stupendous sum of $14,600,000,000 a year. Other factors too numerous to mention here (such as subtraction of moneys now spent in charitable contributions for those presently unemployed) would enter into the picture, but it is certain that many billions of dollars—far more than our foreign markets bring—would pour immediately into our domestic markets. And these certain beneficial results would immediately begin to accrue:

First. Resumption of industry with an immediate improvement in farm prices as the result of increased demand for same.

Second. Stabilization of employment.

Third. Stimulation of all lines of production.

Fourth. Restoration of confidence in the future.

Fifth. Ease of strain on financial structure.

Sixth. Restoration of people's faith in their Government.

Seventh. Abolition of fear which results in hoarding.

Eighth. Rising prices.

Ninth. Reduction of strain on charitable organizations.

Tenth. Rising wages as industry recovered.

Eleventh. Stabilization of living standards at a point slightly below those of 1929.

Twelfth. A greater independence of foreign markets, most of which are gone from us for years to come.

Thirteenth. A new era of self-contained and stabilized prosperity.

Fourteenth. Rising values of all stocks and bonds.

Fifteenth. Balancing of the Budget through increased flow of income taxes and a repeal of all "nuisance" taxes.

Sixteenth. Increased dividends and interest payments.

Seventeenth. Prevention of an appalling social and financial cost in the future due to social and physical evils now being set up by bitterness, fear, worry, malnutrition, and privation.

Many other benefits would flow from the adoption of the plan of spreading the work available among all the workers. We are at present giving little thought to the appalling costs we are piling up for the future by our present conditions. We hear that nobody is starving. Starvation is not a matter of a given period. The individual who drags through weary months or years of privation and malnutrition to fall victim to some ailment which, were he normally sustained, he would successfully resist, is the victim of starvation just as surely as the man who may starve in a few weeks because he has had no food at all.

The cost to support the mentally or physically deficient, the criminally inclined, the cost of apprehending, prosecuting, and convicting the future criminals who may be made as a result of conditions of the present, can not be calculated, but it will be stupendous.

Congress can not put the shorter week-day plan into execution throughout the industry of the United States without a constitutional amendment. And a constitutional amendment could not be achieved in time to arrest our downward plunge in this depression. But the Congress can, in so far as the Government is concerned, adopt the plan, because in that case the Government is the employer.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, a modification of this plan was offered as an amendment to the economy bill under consideration in the House recently. It was offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], and it followed the suggestion offered several times by President Hoover. It provided for a 5-day week only. I supported this amendment.

A further investigation and a scrutiny of available statistics disclose the fact that the Ramseyer proposal did not go far enough. It should have also provided the 6-hour day. It was unfortunate that the proposal was defeated. It should have included the 6-hour day. Accepted, it would not only have preserved the jobs of the Federal workers now employed, but it would have added many thousands of those now unemployed to the numbers thereof and at the same time affected a substantial saving to the taxpayers. The Democratic majority of the House, in my judgment, was most unwise in rejecting this amendment.

If Congress would adopt the plan I am now offering, and if such action could be immediately followed by a conference between a coalition of leaders of both political parties in the House and Senate, with representatives of finance, industry, labor, and commercial organizations like the United States Chamber of Commerce, there is no question but that the plan could be put into execution—with sufficient propaganda in the press—to be effective in every line of industry in this country within a short time.

It is all well enough for doubters to say, "How would you prevent selfish interests from either refusing to cooperate, or, if pretending to cooperate, from violating the agreement?" My answer to that is this: Everybody old enough remembers the Liberty bond campaigns. There was no legal requirement for anybody to buy a Liberty bond in the days of the war, but every Member of this Congress knows what happened to the individual who refused or evaded the purchase of Liberty bonds. If this Congress, the administration, finance, industry, organized labor, and the press got behind a patriotic movement for the 5-day week, 6-hour day plan, in the interest of the welfare of this country, what employer would dare refuse to cooperate? How long could he evade? His own employees would expose him at his first attempt to violate the agreement, and popular resentment would ruin his business in a month. The plan can be put over and put over quickly if we are determined to do it.

Now, the argument arises that we are asking the wage earners and the salaried employees to give up 25 per cent of their gross income to save their country. That is true. And if the wage earner does that, then we can and are now demanding that wealth make the same proportionate sacrifice, too, through drastic increases in income and estate taxes, in order to more quickly reestablish this country upon a stable basis. Why? Because the stocks and bonds held by the wealthy would rapidly rise in value; dividends would be resumed; interest payments would be resumed; the personal security of the wealthy would be assured; the stability of this Government would be assured—and, mark you—nobody needs stable Government more than those who have the most wealth.

The financial leaders, the industrial leaders, the wealthy would be quick to see those benefits, and just as rising values of stocks and bonds and resumption of dividends and interest payments would soon wipe out the effects of this sacrifice on the part of wealth, so would rising wages soon wipe out the sacrifice on the part of the wage earner. We would be spiraling back upward toward at least a 90 per cent stabilized prosperity in this country, and of course everybody would be benefited by that, just as everybody has been hurt, badly hurt, by the downward spiral we have been and still are following.

So, then, if the Government takes the lead in this plan, it must be followed by private employers doing likewise; and the machinery is already set up for the plan to be put into effect. We have chambers of commerce in every city and village; we have banks in every city and village; we have central labor councils in every section; business and industrial interests could be assembled in conference in every community and the plan put into effect with very little delay.

Now arises the question, Would the wage earners agree to this plan? My answer is they would. They see the evil of cutting wages and asking workers to work eight hours for less than eight hours' pay. Suppose we had a private industry employing four or five thousand men; suppose the employers assembled their workers and said:

"Now, boys, we are faced, as you are aware, with this situation: There is business enough only for 75 per cent of our force and our capacity. Either one-fourth of you men must be laid off to go hungry, and with your families to go into the bread lines or you must all work one-fourth less time with no decrease in your hourly base rate of pay, but with a temporary decrease of one-fourth of your daily income in order that your unfortunate and unemployed comrades may also have jobs. Now, if we have to discharge one-fourth of you, we will put all your names in a hat, shake them up and the first 25 per cent of names drawn out lose their jobs; therefore, we can not tell which of you would go. The rest who would remain at work would have to give some of their earnings as charity to help keep their unfortunate, idle comrades from starving. Now, you boys decide this—vote on this proposition—if one-fourth of you boys lose your jobs it will be because you have decided it yourselves—now vote."

Who doubts that each of those men would vote for the same base wage to continue and hours and days of work to be cut one-fourth, rather than chance losing his job? Who doubts that the great majority of American workingmen would gladly accept this proposition if by so doing they were making it possible for all to have jobs and at the same time hasten the return of normal conditions?

The wage earner resents having his wages cut. And he should. If he is worth a certain wage for a certain amount of work one time, he must be worth the same wage for the same amount of work another time. But he can, in my opinion, and does understand the necessity for having to share up his work with his unemployed comrades, for he, to the extent of 87 per cent, is having to support that unemployed brother and his family now. So the sacrifice on the part of the wage earner would be a willing and voluntary sacrifice instead of an unwilling and enforced sacrifice.

The wage earner would object to and resent having to take a 25 per cent reduction in his gross income for the good of his country unless wealth made an equal sacrifice, and he should resent any such unfair proposal. Therefore, he would have to be assured that wealth would make its sacrifice too, and the faith would have to be kept. Congress is now providing such sacrifice on the part of wealth through drastic increases in the income and estate taxes, as I stated a moment ago.

We are face to face with the most serious situation in the history of this country. We must act now. The greatest burden has not yet fallen upon the charitable organizations. Millions who have not been heard of in this depression are moving toward the bread lines. Why? Because as the depression continues the savings of the thrifty are being consumed in supporting not only themselves but their unemployed relatives. Those savings are rapidly becoming exhausted, and that means that usually not one family but two or three families are thrown upon the public charge as each savings account is exhausted.

The effects of the depression become more rapidly and progressively cumulative. It is like a snowball started rolling down a mountain—the more snow it gathers the bigger it becomes; the bigger it becomes the more snow it gathers.

The emergency measures which have been adopted so far have all been beneficial in their way as temporary expediencies, but they are not enough. Through them we are treating the symptoms only. Necessary treatment, yes. But to cure permanently this patient the cause of this national illness must be removed. Unless and until labor is restored to those willing to work, until the purchasing power is pumped in at the base line of the structure—consuming power—through the resumption of wages to the wage earners, this depression will not lift but will become worse, and the patient will die. There is no other place to pump new blood into the anemic economic structure, and achieve lasting benefits.

Regardless of how much wealth one man may have, he can consume only so much food, wear only so many clothes, use only so many automobiles, use only so many doctors, have only so much laundry done. And it must be obvious that one man having all the wealth could not consume as much, waste as he would, as would 122,000,000 people with the wealth distributed among them. Money is not the only limit of consuming capacity. So we must inject new life into the foundation, and when that is done, demand will turn the wheels of industry, labor in factory and on farm will be profitably employed, finance will again find investment at profitable rates and we will spiral upward. If we do not do this and we continue to spiral downward, no man can now foretell the extent of the evil results which may ensue.

To the thoughtful person this indicates that we are confronted with the selection of one of two roads we must follow in the future. We must either so arrange our affairs that there will be a limited amount of employment for all at fair and equitable wages or we must go down the years with an ever increasing number of those constantly unemployed for whom the balance of us must provide the necessities of life.

The thing taking place in the country and the world is complete economic readjustment. An exhaustive study of statistics and conditions will convince the most skeptical that a proper readjustment can come only from a frank acknowledgment of the situation so ably outlined by Mr. Frey, and a mutual determination on the part of industry, finance, and labor that the benifits of their combined endeavors shall be more equitably distributed. It is only in this way that the consuming power of the American people can be kept at a point where industry and finance can be profitably and continuously employed. All statistics show conclusively that benefits to labor and to agriculture have not kept pace with those to industry and finance, and until this condition is corrected no lasting benefits can accrue to any one of them.

The specific benefit of this plan to agriculture is manifold. The farmer's market is not among other farmers. It is among the non-agricultural classes, most of whom are the factory workers, the white-collar workers, and other gainfully employed persons of the towns and cities, who do not produce foodstuffs but do produce manufactured goods or service. With restoration of the consuming and purchasing power among the other gainfully employed, a demand for agricultural products which does not now exist by reason of reduced purchasing power would be revived. This, in turn, would result not only in an increased market for farm products, but the demand would, under the operation of the law of supply and demand, also increase the price for these products.

This is one of the phases of this whole plan which most strongly commends itself to me, because it now agreed by every economic authority in the United States that this country never can again be normally prosperous until agriculture has been made prosperous. The dry maxim that the farmer is the backbone of the country has been repeated so many times it has come to be regarded as a political expression rather than an economic fact. But it still remains an economic fact that agriculture is the backbone of this Nation and that until we can evolve some plan which will offer prompt and permanent relief for the American farmer, along the lines of sound economic production rather than governmental loans and encouragement to get further into debt, this country will not again be prosperous.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Just what remedial legislation does the gentleman believe would be helpful to agriculture in the way of increasing the purchasing power?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think the restoration of the purchasing power of the consumers of farm products through the plan I am submitting is the shortest cut to a prosperous agriculture. As a matter of fact, there can be no prosperity for the farmer unless the consumer has the money to buy. If we put into the hands of the city wage earners money with which to buy the crops of the farmers, it will create a genuine demand for those products, and prosperity will quickly come to the farmer through that demand. The McNary bill, reported the other day by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, if enacted into law, would make effective the tariff on agricultural products of which there is an exportable surplus, and this also would be helpful.

The American farmer at times needs governmental loans, but he much prefers to raise his agricultural products by his labor and then have a fair market in which to sell these products at a fair price, which will afford him a fair profit on his investment and a fair return on his labor and managerial effort.

The plan proposed here is a permanent plan, to be revised and made more efficient as experience is gained. It is based upon the 5-day week, made necessary by the development of labor-displacing machinery. It can be expanded when necessary by increasing the hours of labor per day. It can be contracted by decreasing the same, leaving all our people employed at all times. It has the virtue, among others, of offering agriculture the kind of relief that agriculture has been crying for, namely, a fair market in which to sell its products, a fair price for these products, with a fair return in profits for the energy, experience, and labor expended. [Applause.]

THE OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement by the chairman of the petroleum division of the American Mining Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, while the oil industry is among the most widely patronized, yet at the same time it is among the least understood of all industries. Permit me to give you a suggestive outline.

Oil and its refined products comprise several important major industries. The producing industry, with its 300,000 producing wells, on an average drills 20,000 wells annually at a cost of $500,000,000, producing in 1930, 896,265,000 barrels of crude oil.

The transportation industry has a mileage of trunk and gathering lines of more than 100,000 miles. It has 150,000 tank cars and furnishes a greater railway tonnage to the railroads than any other industry. Its transportation by water includes 369 steam and motor tankers with a gross of 2,314,000 tons.

The refining industry has 1,035 refineries in 30 different States with a daily capacity of 10,516,000 barrels, representing 85 per cent of the world's refining capacity and one-fifth in total value among the manufacturing industries of the United States.

The marketing of crude oil and its refined products is likewise an important industry. It not only handles the billion barrels of crude produced annually but in addition approximately 400,000,000 barrels of gasoline, 60,000,000 barrels of kerosene, 400,000,000 barrels of gas for fuel oils, and 34,000,000 barrels of lubricants. It has built up an export trade of approximately $500,000,000 annually. In its retail trade it has 350,000 service stations which supply gasoline and motor oil for the 27,000,000 motor vehicles.

These various industries of oil pay more than $100,000,000 annually in the way of taxes. The consumers of gasoline pay State taxes totaling $500,000,000 annually on gasoline alone. With the exception of the railroads, the building trades, and shipping, the industries are the next best patrons of the products of iron and steel.

The common impression is that the direct benefits of the producing industry are limited to the producers of oil, but such is not the case. There is reserved to every landowner a one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced, delivered free of cost to the owner's credit in the pipe lines. In addition to that, in the oil States nearly all the land, at one time or another, has been under lease for long periods of time at a rental of $1 per acre. These rentals go direct to the landowners, who in a large majority of cases are farmers, a farm of 160 acres of land receiving annually $160 in cash for oil rentals. This money has helped maintain the family on the farm in the payment of taxes and interest on the mortgage. In the State of Kansas alone the actual income to the farmers of that State from oil rentals is approximately $10,500,000 per year, and the same is proportionately true in the States of California, Wyoming, Montana, Colorado, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, and the other oil-producing States.

The rentals of land for oil are not limited to the close proximity area of a producing well. They extend fifty or a hundred miles from producing territory, affording a reserve of prospective oil territory to the industry. The royalty reserved by the farmer in producing areas is a cash asset which, when distributed, affords a source for small investments to all classes of people who likewise become interested in the producing end of the industry.

The direct benefits are perhaps as widely distributed, if not more so, than in many other industries. The mammoth and costly equipment of all the industries of oil is composed largely of steel, iron, and the products of motor and truck factories in our Eastern States, products in which the element of labor reaches as high as 75 per cent of the cost. Production must have its steel rigs, steel casing, steel drills, cables, storage tanks, pipe lines, boilers, pumps, and engines, the purchase of which products affording steady employment at good wages to labor in the eastern iron plants and steel plants. It is an American industry with 90 per cent of its laboring men Americans.

There are 19 oil-producing States, a larger number directly interested in the production of oil than there are cotton States, wheat States, corn States, steel States, textile States. No other industry has an equal radiation of direct benefits or indirect benefits in the distribution of its production. The major industries of oil represent a capital investment of $12,000,000,000 by 2,250,000 investors and furnish employment to 2,000,000 men.

The following article by Earl Oliver, a leading representative citizen of Ponca City, Okla., and chairman of the petroleum division of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, is incorported herewith for its constructive educational value. It is a brief statement of the ills of the industry, of the legislative program proposed, and the necessity of organized cooperative effort to secure an orderly rehabilitation of the industry, equally protective of the rights of the producers and the consuming public.

The article appeared in the issue of the Oil and Gas Journal of April 21, 1932, with the editorial comment following the article herewith.

OIL INDUSTRY'S PROBLEMS AND REMEDIES—CROSS-SECTION OF OPINION FROM MANY LEADERS SHOWS REMARKABLE SIMILARITY OF THOUGHT—PUBLIC SUPPORT NEEDED

By Earl Oliver, Ponca City, Okla.

The writer, under direction of the Oil and Gas Journal, interviewed many leaders of industry, of government, of law, of politics, in the endeavor to find out what is wrong with the oil industry, and, if possible, what the cure is. It would be impossible to set out in detail the many answers given, but in attempting to sift them out and find what they all mean, we believe we have found a remarkable similarity of thought running through them all. They differ in detail but in fundamentals they agree.

We have attempted to piece these answers into one complete whole in as simple a manner as possible. We believe the questions and answers hereafter propounded accurately represent a fair cross-section of opinion, as we found it to exist among well-informed leaders in these various fields of activity. They are given here in the hope they might help to simplify a somewhat complicated problem. We believe a sympathetic public opinion and unanimity of action can be developed toward correcting the oil industry's ills if the procedure hereinafter suggested, arising out of the observation of many men, is observed.

1. What is causing the petroleum industry's difficulties?—The basic laws of oil and gas conflict with sound engineering and economic principles and initiate a trail of results that dominate each successive branch of the industry. Even the destructive practices of the marketing branch are largely traceable back to the capture theory of ownership that forces crude oil on the market in excess of current demand.

2. How manifested?—By a competitive race to extract; by unfair division of oil and gas; by vast duplication of developing, producing, transporting, refining, and marketing facilities; by inefficient wasteful extraction; by failure of the law of supply and demand to operate effectively, thereby causing chronic overproduction; and by uncorrelated marketing—all resulting in high production and marketing costs, destructive sales competition, and elimination of profits.

3. With what result?—Ruthless destruction of the Nation's irreplaceable natural resources and economic chaos in the industry.

4. Who is injured, and how?—Oil company stockholders, through loss of capital investment and dividends; labor, through irregular employment; royalty and land owners, through decline of royalty, rental, and bonus payments; consumers, through destruction of supply leading to eventual high prices; the State, through loss of taxes; everybody, through demoralization of business.

5. Who is benefited, and how?—Nobody; not even the supply houses, for their business is rendered unstable by these conditions. The consumer's apparent benefit is misleading. He could enjoy the same permanent reasonable prices through sharing in the saving made possible out of production and marketing costs under proper methods, and in addition avoid later exceedingly high prices by delaying exhaustion.

6. Can these ills be corrected without changing the law?—No.

7. Why?—Because the law determines the right of each owner and thereby controls the method of development.

8. What changes in the law are necessary?—Changes that will promote instead of prevent the application of sound engineering and economic principles to the development of oil and gas pools.

9. Would this mean increased governmental supervision?—No. On the contrary, suitable changes would eliminate the need for extensive governmental supervision. The present laws promote methods of development and operation altogether unsuited to the products to which they apply. Suitable laws would permit the several States to dispense with martial-law control or State-employed umpires, and to hand back the operation of oil properties to their respective owners, to the great good of government, the owners, and society generally—for the State government has other more suitable functions to perform than to supervise in great detail privately owned oil properties as it is compelled to do under present oil and gas laws.

10. What should be the chief characteristics of these changed laws?—(a) They should be directed toward efficient development and production practices, not only in the public welfare, but that no one owner shall by his method injure another owner.

(b) They should substitute for the "capture theory" in oil and gas, regulatory action in development and operation that would have the same practical results as would "ownership in place," strictly applied.

(c) They should protect the small owner against injustice or elimination.

(d) They should protect the consuming public against exploitation in price or waste of product.

(e) They should provide for restricting production to market demand as estimated from time to time by some governmental agency—preferably by an interstate compact organization also authorized to negotiate for foreign restrictions (as per Secretary Wilbur's proposal).

11. Can the petroleum industry alone correct the difficulty?—No.

12. Why?—Because the petroleum industry is not the law-making body; also, because it represents only a small percentage of those who will be affected by the legal changes.

13. Who can correct these difficulties?—Legislative, judicial, and executive branches of Government, State and Federal.

14. Can they do it alone?—No.

15. Why?—They are neither sufficiently informed on the problem nor sufficiently supported by public sentiment.

16. What, then, is needed?—Education.

17. Of whom?—Oil men, royalty owners, landowners, consumers of petroleum products, voters, lawyers, legislators, judges, attorneys general, governors, Presidents, and other officials of Government, both present and potential, so that united thought and action might be developed among all interested parties.

18. On what?—On efficient engineering methods of oil-pool development and operation; on why and how present oil and gas laws interfere with application of efficient engineering methods, and on the penalties that are being paid because of the present laws by consumers of petroleum products, taxpayers, and society generally; also by royalty owners, landowners, individual producers, and oil company stockholders. The method should be that of true educational and factual information as distinguished from propaganda.

19. Education by whom?—By innumerable petroleum engineers, oil lawyers, company executives, and others who have made a study of those problems.

20. Why is it necessary to educate such a vast and varied number of people?—Because all these people are directly interested and consequently are entitled to a voice in settling the question; because they are not only entitled to a voice but can successfully demand it since they can defeat or control the proposed legislation, and will do so if its merits are not understood by them. Their power to defeat or control legislation is in proportion to their voting strength, and in that respect the consumer far outweighs all others. Since Government officials, who alone can change these laws, not only represent the oil industry but in like manner represent the consuming public that can and will remove any official who is believed to have betrayed their interest, it is imperative that the consuming public be educated as to the merits of the proposed change.

21. Can this vast educational program be successfully promoted without being well organized?—No.

22. What educational agencies are available? Trade associations, scientific and professional societies, governmental agencies, trade journals, newspapers, civic clubs, national-defense organizations, etc.

23. What is a trade association?—A voluntary combination of members of a class to promote the mutual welfare of its membership.

24. Name some trade associations that would be appropriate educational agencies for this purpose.—American Petroleum Institute, National Petroleum Association, Mid-Continental Oil and Gas Association, Independent Petroleum Association, Mid-Continent Royalty Owners Association, Texas Oil Conservation Association, etc.

25. What is a scientific society?—A voluntary association of members of a class to promote certain knowledge for the benefit of society generally.

26. Name some scientific and professional societies that would be appropriate educational agencies.—American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, American Association of Petroleum Geologists, American Society of Mechanical Engineers, American Bar Association, State bar association, etc.

27. What is a government?—An organization of all individuals in a given area to regulate and control their mutual conduct toward each other.

28. Name some appropriate governmental agencies.—Federal Oil Conservation Board, Oklahoma Corporation Commission, Texas Railroad Commission, etc.

29. Are all the agencies named, together with trade publications and newspapers, needed in this educational task?—Yes.

30. Why?—Because of the magnitude of the task. Changing the habits of a vast industry and enlisting the confidence and consent of 40,000,000 voters, who are likewise gasoline consumers, to pass laws permitting that change is no small undertaking. Each of the agencies named will educate individuals within the circle of its own influence and the sum total of their several influences will be cumulative in effect, thus accomplishing the task much more rapidly; also because a task so handled is not only more certain to safeguard the rights of all interested parties, including consumers, but participation by their own leaders in formulating the change and promoting it will enlist the confidence and cooperation of those whose personal interests are affected. All the trade organizations affiliated with the oil industry are needed because the members of each have a special interest to protect. The scientific societies are needed to take the movement out of the realm of partisan activities and shape it to the welfare of society generally. Government agencies are needed not only to inspire confidence that the interests of all will be protected but also to assist in promoting the processes of law by which the change is to be made. The trade publications are the channels through which education is carried to those engaged in the industry, and newspapers are the channels through which education is brought to the consuming public. Civic societies are additional educational channels.

31. Can any one agency of these many successfully accomplish the task alone?—No.

32. Why?—In the first place it would be too slow. No one agency has force and influence to move the load. In the second place the movement must be taken from the realm of selfish group promotion and placed in the broader field of benefits to society generally before all the necessary influences can be organized behind it. These several agencies, including trade publications and newspapers, will not lend themselves to partisan propaganda, whereas they will lend themselves to the dissemination of scientific truth when that dissemination is clearly needed for the welfare of society. In the third place each individual and group naturally and properly feels that it is entitled to a voice in setting any matter involving its own welfare, and when excluded from exercising such voice resents the exclusion. Any single agency asserting the exclusive right to formulate solutions that involve the welfare of innumerable others will arouse suspicion, resentment, and opposition too great to overcome. Those excluded feel some advantage is being taken of them, and the suspicion is usually well founded, for a solution worked out by only one party in interest is likely to be biased in its effect.

33. How, then, can this great educational and legislative program be most effectively promoted?—By creating a central committee or organization that will gradually draw together into a united effort all the organizations named in questions 23 to 29, inclusive, that are willing to promote this movement, or such members of those organizations as favor the movement when the organization itself can not join in promoting it, because of divided sentiment among its membership. Stabilizing the petroleum industry is of sufficient consequences to justify taking whatever reasonable means will most effectively accomplish that end.

34. What should be the characteristics of the proposed central organization?—(a) It should be 100 per cent for the program; (b) it should be composed of individuals from every class of people that would be affected by the legislation; (c) its members should be selected, first, because of their peculiar fitness for the task undertaken, and second, because of their influence with their own class.

35. Why not use an organization already set up?—Because none of those now in existence meets the necessary qualifications. Having been organized for entirely different purposes, it is not to be expected the membership of anyone selected would be found 100 per cent for this program, or that it would be truly representative of all groups that would be affected by this legislation, or that the members were particularly fitted to promote or would take the time to study and present a complicated engineering-economic-legal problem.

36. From what groups should members of the proposed special organization be drawn?—From the oil industry, law, and government. From royalty owners and producers. From "independents" and "majors." From consumers and taxpayers. From State and Federal agencies.

37. Will not this diversity of representation make an agreement upon a program difficult?—No. Engineers are in 100 per cent agreement unit operation is the desirable method of oil-field development. Officials of government and leaders of industry both agree that some method should be devised whereby production can be restricted to market demand. Division of oil and gas from a common reservoir among the several landowners in proportion to the extractable content of their own land is generally regarded as fair. These are also the objectives sought by the oil industry. If it secures them it is not concerned by whom they are secured. If selection of membership is conditioned upon acceptance of these principles, with the purpose of promoting their adoption by legislation, the greatest element of division is thereby eliminated. The chief function of such an organization would be widespread education. Members of any organization who agree on the basic principles and are organized to promote them are not likely to differ on mere processes of education.

38. What are the chief obstacles to overcome in promoting this program?—Selfishness, fear, and suspicion—selfishness, in that each interest is frequently disposed to demand undue advantage at the expense of others and a deadlock ensues; fear of those competitors in whom much power is centered; and suspicion as to the good faith of those in position of leadership. Both unit operation of oil pools and restriction of production to market demand are being, and have been, regarded, misunderstood, and misrepresented by those opposed to them as mere devices of major oil companies to secure monopolistic control of the oil industry to the disadvantage of both the consumer and "independent." These two latter groups have such overwhelming voting strength that they can and will defeat any legislation promoting these remedies unless convinced said remedies would be beneficial to them.

39. How can these obstacles be overcome?—By education, by cooperation, and by leadership. Any thorough consideration of all facts will clearly demonstrate that both unit operation and restriction of production to market demand will tend to promote, if in fact they are not actually essential to economic recovery of the oil industry. Also, that instead of being detrimental to consumers and "independents" they will be highly beneficial to both groups provided proper safeguards are thrown around them. Many leading "independents," consumers, and officials of government are advocates of these measures. Enlisting their cooperation will inspire confidence in those several groups that adequate safeguards protecting them will be established.

Any determination of market demand should be made solely by Government agencies. Perhaps it should be determined by an interstate compact organization in which the Federal Government as well as the several oil-producing State governments will participate. In that event the consuming public will have every assurance the figure set from time to time as "market demand" does in fact represent such an approach to that concept as is to the best interest of all parties concerned. Representatives of government, both State and Federal, should, therefore, also be among those included in the special organization, so that consumers will have all assurances their interests are being protected.

Establishment of confidence on the part of all interests to be affected is the one prerequisite to successful promotion of the legislative campaign. Knowledge on their part of the things being done, and the privilege of participating in their development, are highly important; but over and above these must be leadership that will develop and maintain a broad, unselfish, open-door program—a leadership with vision, courage, and loyalty. Both industry and government are full of such men who have attained leadership in their own respective fields of action, large or small as that may be. Great numbers of these should be enlisted to form this special organization and to assist in promoting its objectives. Should the effort be so organized there is little doubt but that, with the help of the agencies named in questions 23 to 29, inclusive, public sentiment would soon not only permit but would even demand that legislation of the type we have described shall be adopted.

An effort organized in this manner, participated in by those outside the oil industry as well as those within, would develop a sympathetic public attitude toward the industry and a freedom of action for it that could not be secured if the industry were to promote the effort solely through its own membership and without outside help. A reasonable freedom of action for the oil industry is necessary if it is to serve society efficiently. The legislation problem does not arise out of the law's inability to correct, or even lack of knowledge of what law is needed, but it is due instead to fear on the part of the public that what is requested might enable the present large companies to become even larger and more powerful—all at the expense of the public and the small companies. Obviously this fear can be dissipated more effectively by students of the problem not interested in the large companies than it can by the large companies themselves. Any legislation adopted will have fewer objectionable restrictions if secured in the manner described rather than through the sole efforts of the industry. A familiar example of the latter type is the result that came from the recent special session of the Texas Legislature, wherein the law finally evolved had so many restrictions that it appears to be wholly inadequate to meet the situation, and continuance of martial law has been found necessary to prevent a return of chaos.

The oil industry is entitled to suitable legislation that will enable it to serve efficiently. But securing it is a political undertaking. Progress will be made when it is recognized that that which is requested runs counter to the prejudice of millions of voters in whose hands the decision lies. Consequently any success means a campaign of education that will break down that prejudice. Facts are available with which to do it, and success is possible provided the plans are made equally extensive as is the magnitude of the task to be undertaken. The end sought is worth careful planning. This is a political problem and must be so handled.

40. Does this mean use of so-called practical politics?—No. The number of people that might be affected by these changes is too vast to enable them to be brought about in that manner. Instead the changes can only be accomplished through the means intended by those who designed the American form of government, namely, through an educated public opinion.

41. Is there a fundamental difference in approach between a political problem and an industrial one?—Yes; the distinction involved in the age-old conflict between human rights and property rights.

42. Does this distinction have a bearing on the problem under consideration?

We believe it does. At least an attempt will be made to analyze it in the hope it will reemphasize the kind of approach that must be taken to secure the desired legislation in this instance.

The primary function of government is to protect human rights while that of industry is to deal with property rights The second, of course, is merely subsidiary to the first, but their origins are so remote and their personnel so distinct that their true relationships are not always clearly defined. Too frequently they are regarded as conflicting spheres of action. Regarding the first it might be said the people of the United States are thoroughly imbued with the spirit of democracy—that all men are free and equal, which merely means that every man feels he is entitled to a voice in the adjustment of those things which affect him. It is the right that man has fought for through the ages although he rarely uses it wisely. Nevertheless he is jealous of it and will continue to fight for it perhaps even more strenuously than for any other single thing. All government in the United States, State and Federal, was designed to perpetuate that right. Every citizen was given a vote and he does not hesitate to use it when he is led to believe that right is being violated. Elections were made frequent and terms in office short so that officeholders might not forget where authority lies. Government built on that principle has disadvantages as well as advantages. Nevertheless it is the system we operate under and any legislative proposals that seem to run counter to it will meet with insurmountable opposition regardless of their inherent merit. Thus government in the United States is democratic in form and spirit.

On the other hand, by the very nature of the case industry can not be so. Those in authority are placed there by the owners of capital invested and their primary duty is to secure returns on that capital. Where great aggregations of capital are brought together the individual in command wields great power over the welfare of many human beings and the measure of his success is the amount he can get from and out of those over whom he wields this power. His obligation to his employer demands that of him. As the wealth he controls increases, his power over human beings increases correspondingly, and since his duty is to extract wealth from them, they in turn through their votes undertake to see that he shall not use his power unfairly. It is out of this ebb and flow of power the antitrust laws spring and they will probably be with us in some form so long as capital combines and men remain free. They can not be eliminated; they can only be adjusted.

While, therefore, American Government is democratic in form and spirit, industry of necessity is autocratic in form and spirit. In American Government power rests at the bottom and every precaution was taken to insure its remaining there. In American industry power of necessity rests at the top and precaution is taken by those who set up the machinery of industry that it shall remain there. That form of organization is more efficient.

Thus autocracy in industry and democracy in government both have their merits as well as their defects, and we believe it is well that the two exist together in this complementary relationship, for democracy in government tends to protect and perpetuate individual human rights while at the same time autocracy in industry tends to give the desired efficiency that arises out of that form of management. They tend to neutralize each other and form a composite result better than either alone would do. Yet these two conflicting principles working together in this close relationship also tend to promote conflict between government and industry, or at least promote difficulty on the part of their respective leaders in arriving at a common viewpoint as to type of legislation that will best serve society.

We again refer to the recent Texas legislative effort as a familiar illustration of the difficulty that arises out of these conflicting viewpoints of government and industry. Perhaps no question existed in any quarter relative to the need of legislation. The State, the industry, consumers, labor, landowners, and society generally were suffering greatly by the absence of suitable legislation and no one benefited by its absence. It seemed incredible before the special session was called that corrective legislation of some kind would not be quickly passed.

The various bills presented were concededly inadequate solutions, in that they did not go to the root of the trouble, but at least some of them promised a measure of relief and had the support of the great bulk of the Texas oil industry. They restricted certain freedom of action previously enjoyed by the individual, but that is characteristic of most every law passed. However, the opposition to legislation in any form managed to arouse suspicion against that which was proposed by branding it monopolistic. This charge, groundless as it was, was sufficient to develop so many restrictions and safeguards as to render the resultant legislation wholly inadequate under which to operate the Texas oil industry, and portions of it have since remained under martial law.

Consideration of the spirit of democracy in American life operating under a form of government that permits every man or woman to register his or her resentment or distrust in an effective manner, secretly and without fear of reaction, will make clear why the Texas legislative attempt failed to produce suitable oil and gas laws and why any other like effort will fail, either in Texas or elsewhere, that voting is free, unless public understanding is developed as to what the issues are about and confidence is established that liberty is not being surrendered. Otherwise legislation of the type proposed runs counter to prejudices that will defeat the undertaking or result in compromises that are little better than the evils meant to be corrected.

CONCLUSION

Thus we repeat, any legislation proposing a solution that might affect practically every inhabitant of this land through the price for which he or she purchases gasoline and other petroleum products; that might affect the freedom of action of the so-called independent oil man or oil company; that might modify the character of interest held by the vast multitudes of royalty owners—would have difficulty of passage under any circumstances unless its merits were understood. But when in addition it is misinterpreted and misrepresented as giving additional power to and for the benefit of great oil companies already vast in extent, and in popular estimation wealthy beyond the dreams of avarice, then passage of the legislation becomes impossible—unless an understanding public sentiment can be developed. And that public sentiment can be developed only through the cooperative action, not merely of the great oil companies, but of the consumers, and Government officials, and scientists, and independent operators, and royalty owners, and others who know the problem and the price society is paying for the present unsound methods of development. With such cooperative action well organized we believe an understanding public sentiment can be developed. And certainly the issues at stake justify the attempt.

REMOVE THE CAUSE

The oil industry has been sick a long time. Hundreds of remedies have been suggested, most of them ignoring the primal cause of the trouble.

Ingeniously elaborated prescriptions have been offered, and rough and tumble methods have been applied without assurance of permanent recovery because the seat of the disease remains untouched.

The industry is overwhelmed with too much oil, and every effort is being made to control the flood, but what is being done to stop its source?

For two generations men hunted oil like wild game. It was regarded as the property of whoever captured it. Out of that conception has come all the troubles that beset the industry to-day.

It inspired a ceaseless search for oil and immediate necessity of producing it when found because offsets might rob the discoverer of his find.

That necessity was recognized in lease requirements compelling instant production regardless of the law of supply and demand.

Although the industry had more than enough oil in Seminole and Oklahoma City and elsewhere and any new discovery meant a further demoralization of the business a Rusk County wildcat started a race that opened the floodgates in east Texas.

The State of Texas, the whole oil industry, was appalled at the waste and destruction that impended. Drastic, even desperate measures had to be resorted to but not before vast damage had been done and immense losses suffered in every branch of the oil business and in every business or community affected by the condition of the oil industry and those engaged in it.

As a consequence the oil industry finds itself more and more entangled in regulation, more and more obliged to look for aid in ordering its affairs to political intervention.

There is but one way out. That is, as Earl Oliver points out in this issue of the Oil and Gas Journal, to get to the root of the trouble, correct the fundamental error in the legal status of oil.

The industry will never be secure from periods of demoralization from overproduction so long as that condition continues.

If the oil industry is ever to be stabilized and placed on a firm foundation it must be protected from these violent fluctuations that arise from the competitive race to produce regardless of consequences.

Oil, instead of being considered free game to whoever is able to capture it, must be given a legal status like any other property. The man who has oil on his property should not be at the mercy of his neighbor.

The industry should not be subject to all the shocks and demoralization fostered by an antiquated conception of oil development that is contrary to all modern knowledge and enormously wasteful of our national resources.

Oil-producing States deriving their main revenue from oil should not be obliged to suffer the loss of millions in values depressed by the operation of iniquitous customs based on legal misapprehension.

The consuming public, in addition to being called upon to make up the losses in oil revenue by increased levies, shares the effects of the demoralization of business, additional taxation, and wasteful practices resulting from hasty overproduction incited by a mistaken law.

Mr. Oliver indicts that original cause by its manifest results: "The competitive race to extract; unfair division of oil and gas; vast duplication of developing, producing, transporting, refining, and marketing facilities; inefficient, wasteful extraction; failure of the law of supply and demand to operate effectively, thereby causing chronic overproduction; and uncorrelated marketing—all resulting in high production and marketing costs, destructive sales competition, and elimination of profits."

He suggests as a substitute for the "capture theory" regulation of oil and gas development and production that would have the same practical results as "ownership in place" strictly applied.

It would thus be possible to adjust output to market demand by letting surplus supplies rest in underground storage, thereby avoiding the excesses, extravagances, and wastes inseparable from the present system through the capture theory putting a premium on immediate production.

Such a reversal of law and tradition is, of course, a tremendous task. The oil industry alone can not hope to achieve it. But a continuance of the changing viewpoint of the industry on this aspect can be accelerated and should be. Oil men have had disastrous experience with the capture theory and its resultant evils. They are about ready to urge a change.

State governments have similarly been educated by dear cost in the fact that the problems of the oil industry react on the States. They need to be shown the fundamental weakness of the law that requires modernization.

The motive power in this campaign of education must begin with the oil industry although it can not stop there. It must, to be effective, be extended through the scientific societies associated with the industry, through trade associations, commercial and civic organizations so that it may produce an understanding among the rank and file of the great consuming and voting public which, in the last analysis, must be convinced into approval and support.

There has been a remarkable change in popular attitude toward the oil business within the past decade. The industry is no longer condemned offhand and unheard. Thanks to the policy of taking the public into confidence and placing the cards on the table the oil industry has emerged from the cloud of suspicion and distrust that made it for so long a veritable Ishmael.

A State official or Federal Government can now speak a word for the oil industry without being howled down by mob prejudice. The country understands that the oil industry is a business like any other and entitled to fair consideration of its problems.

It can be shown, as Mr. Oliver shows, that the chief obstacle to stabilization of the oil industry is the law which puts a premium on wasteful and unjust practices. It can be shown that the change needed will be in the general interest, not only of those in the oil business, whether producers, refiners, marketers, royalty owners, or stockholders, but in the interest of the public at large as consumers of petroleum products and taxpayers, by the elimination of the basic cause of the industry's troubles.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, before we adjourn, in view of the fact that it is apparent that after the consideration of several matters that have been reported by the Committee on Rules, which we have announced we would undertake to dispose of next Tuesday, we will have time for the consideration of other matters, I take the liberty of suggesting to the majority leader, in view of the great demand for the consideration of the Private Calendar and that we hope we are approaching the end of the session of the House, that arrangement may be made next week for the consideration of that calendar for two or three days.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I hope that can be done, and I shall present a unanimous-consent request now that the business in order next Wednesday be dispensed with, and that on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of next week it shall be in order to call bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, under the old rule, commencing with the last starred bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is pending before the Committee on Rules an application for a rule to make in order the consideration of the home loan land bank bill. That is a most important bill. The Rules Committee might meet Monday, or tomorrow, and report the matter out. It seems to me it is vastly more important to the country that we proceed with the consideration of that bill next week than with the Private Calendar. Has the gentleman given any thought to that?

Mr. RAINEY. If the Rules Committee should report that out we might take it up Saturday or we might take it up after we get through with the Garner relief bill, which will probably come up a week from Monday.

Mr. MICHENER. Then it is the purpose of the leadership to bring the Garner relief bill up a week from the coming Monday?

Mr. RAINEY. We hope to do it then.

Mr. MICHENER. And the only work before the House during the coming week will be the rules on Tuesday and the Private Calendar during the rest of the week?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. May I suggest and beseech the gentleman to use his influence to have the Rules Committee report out of the home loan bank bill, so that we may give that consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with business in order on Calendar Wednesday next and that Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of next week it be in order to call up bills on the Private Calendar under the old rule, beginning at the last starred bill, and to consider those unobjected to in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Of course, this is not necessarily a fixed order. It simply makes it in order to take up the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Anything else could be taken up. It is entirely within the discretion of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question, first, dispensing with Calendar Wednesday; then I desire to make a suggestion as to the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not well divide the question.

Mr. BLANTON. I call the attention of the majority leader to the fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is not here, that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN] is not here, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] is not here, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] is not here, and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATTERSON] is not here. They all left here a few minutes ago when they thought the House was adjourning and have gone to their offices. They all help us on this Private Calendar, and it is a job even upon the few who assume to do that hard work. Their convenience ought to be consulted, and I hope the gentleman will postpone that request until Tuesday, because they ought to know what is coming up and they ought to be prepared. One or two can not handle all that business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It seems to me nearly a week's notice would be adequate for those gentlemen.

Mr. BLANTON. But suppose those gentleman have other plans?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman, of course, is familiar with the great pressure that is being put on the majority leader and the Speaker to try to get an opportunity to consider bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. I have worked every night and Sunday and holiday since I have been here. I know that it is necessary that those gentlemen should be here. They may have made other plans.

The SPEAKER. May the Chair suggest to the gentleman that, of course, only one objection to these bills would be sufficient to keep them from passing?

Mr. BLANTON. But some of these bills may require more than one objection to stop them.

The SPEAKER. No; not under this rule.

Mr. BLANTON. It is understood, then, that one objection will stop any bill on these three days?

The SPEAKER. That was the request.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I shall not object to the request. I will be here and I will see that there will be at least one objection to every bad bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. Reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, will this deprive Members of the opportunity of addressing the House?

Mr. RAINEY. No; not on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

ADMIRAL FREDERICK C. BILLARD

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker on May 17 last there passed from the Coast Guard Service one of the finest officers and characters who had been in command of that service for many years, the late Admiral Frederick C. Billard.

There is a splendid editorial regarding such officer contained in the Galveston News of May 20, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and incorporate the editorial.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. Actuated by the highest sense of duty, and with a devoted patriotism, Admiral Billard gave the best years of his life to his country and left a record of personal and official success of which anyone might well be proud.

The service, of which he was in command for a number of years, developed and grew into a greater and even more effective organization during his term of office than it had done in many previous years; and such accomplishment was chiefly due to his distinguished ability and untiring work and direction, supplemented by that of his fellow officers and the enlisted personnel of the Coast Guard.

There was in his nature a kindliness and a love for his fellow men which endeared him to all who knew and understood him; and both as an officer and a man he measured up to the highest standards of his countrymen. The editorial from the News reads as follows:

DEATH HALTS THE CAREER OF ADMIRAL BILLARD

Being closely connected with the service headed by Rear Admiral Frederick C. Billard, Galveston feels a sense of personal loss in the death of the commandant of the Nation's Coast Guard. The service has lost a beloved commander and a leader whose influence brought its equipment and rating on a par with its record of distinguished service to the country.

Admiral Billard directed the activities of the Coast Guard for eight years, serving longer than any other commandant. He entered the service in 1894 and advanced through the ranks of commissioned officers until 1924, when he was appointed commandant by President Coolidge. He was reappointed in 1928 and again last January. Under his command the Coast Guard not only lived up to his high standard of service in protecting shipping, in rescue work, and in guarding the coast line against smugglers, but it impressed itself on the country as a highly useful branch of Government service. Admiral Billard worked diligently for better equipment for his branch, and his influence in Washington was largely responsible for the splendid new cutters distributed throughout the service. The cutter Saranac, stationed at Galveston, is one of the type and apparently she was a favorite of the late commandant. Admiral Billard chose the Saranac as his flagship during the Yorktown celebration several months ago.

The Coast Guard has lost an able commander, and the Nation has lost a loyal servant. Galveston joins other friends of the service he loved in mourning his passing.

TAXICAB SITUATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, because I have tried to keep General Patrick and his taxicab monopoly from running all of the independents out of business and have helped to stop him from installing meters in cabs and from imposing on the people of Washington, and have shown that our colleagues, Mr. HASTINGS, Major BULWINKLE, myself and others have been robbed here by meter cabs, there is a man by the name of Bernard L. Henning, who gives his address here as 907 E Street SE., has been writing some of you colleagues here attacking me. Every word he says in his malicious letters about me is untrue, and you colleagues here know that his letter is untrue. He is a dirty, low-down, lying, cowardly skunk to write a letter like that. Several hundred ex-service men who served our flag in France are making a living for their wives and little children by driving these 20-cent zone taxicabs, and if they had to go back to the meter system they would be run out of business.

You colleagues are familiar with every speech I have made against meters, and you know better than anybody else that he is lying.

INVESTIGATION OF PRICES OF FARM MACHINERY

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 217), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry consisting of three members appointed by the chairman of said committee be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to make a thorough investigation of the prices of farm machinery.

The said subcommittee in its investigation shall ascertain:

(1) The comparative average prices paid by farmers in the United States and in the various States for farm machinery during the years 1931 and 1932 compared to the prices paid by them during previous years;

(2) Whether the prices paid by farmers for farm machinery have declined in proportion to the decline in the prices received by farmers for farm products during the periods enumerated under (1) hereof; and if not, what are the principal causes thereof;

(3) The average cost of production, distribution, and marketing of farm machinery in the United States;

(4) The average profits, commissions, rebates, bonuses, or other gains from the manufacture and/or sale of farm machinery;

(5) The extent to which farm machinery has been sold abroad by domestic concerns or individuals at cheaper prices than prevailing prices in the domestic market for similar articles;

(6) What discriminations, if any, exist in the prices charged for farm machinery in different regions of the country, taking into consideration any rebates, bonuses, or other remunerations affecting the costs of the articles.

(7) Any other information that the said subcommittee may deem pertinent to this inquiry.

In ascertaining this information the said subcommittee shall endeavor to secure data concerning representative types of farm machinery commonly used in the United States in the production of the principal farm commodities.

Said committee is hereby authorized, in the performance of its duties, to sit at such times and places, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as it deems necessary or proper. It is specifically authorized to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœna or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents, and to employ counsel, auditors, accountants, or other experts, clerks, and other assistants; and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words. The chairman or any member of said subcommittee may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or who appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law.

The expenses of said investigation, not exceeding in the aggregate $20,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers signed by the chairman of the said subcommittee.

The said subcommittee after making such investigation shall report its findings to the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, to accompany the resolution I present a table from the Agricultural Yearbook, 1931, showing the index numbers of prices paid by farmers for farm machinery, compared with prices of farm products, 1910–1931, which I request may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the committee.

There being no objection, the table was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIVE-DAY WEEK AND THE LABOR SITUATION

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have before me a very thoughtful and carefully considered article on the 5-day-week proposal and the labor situation generally, written by Mr. D. C. Henny, of Portland, Oreg., formerly connected with the Reclamation Service. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT AND ITS CURE—MEETING OF PORTLAND CITY CLUB

PORTLAND, OREG., February 12, 1932.

The capitalistic world to-day stands before the paradoxical fact that in the midst of plenty there is hunger and starvation and suffering. The problem is the more serious as no daylight ahead is observable unless in some manner the underlying cause can be discovered and made clear.

The present depression is by many regarded as a mere repetition of past history. We have had hard times at more or less regular intervals. It is in the nature of things that life and change and action should cause undulations in industry and trade. We have periods of optimism followed by periods of pessimism. Since human nature does not rapidly change and the action of individuals is affected by the psychology of the many, such changes will continue. They bring with them hardship and suffering, but they also provide their own remedy. Prosperity leads to overconfidence, speculation follows and reaches a peak, collapse results, deflation takes place, available stocks on hand become exhausted, and slowly the wheels of manufacture and business begin to turn again and society resumes its way back to normalcy.

Present conditions in the United States have, however, some unusual features. They are very seriously affected by disturbances abroad, in part the immediate result of the World War. International trade is blocked by tariffs and by inability of customers to pay. The effect of this is severe in relation to the extent that any country is dependent on foreign trade. England is probably at the head of the list. The United States has suffered far less seriously, and in such countries as India and China the masses have hardly felt a ripple of economic disturbance from this cause.

The severe depression into which the United States has drifted must have other causes reaching down deeper than reduced foreign trade, which at best amounted to less than 10 per cent of the total. The domestic market is still with us, based on a high standard of living, enjoying unhampered trade movement between the States and having the advantage of a uniform money standard.

Previous depressions have also been severe. That of 1893 is within the memory of many of us. It came with the failure of banks first in England and then here. It entailed suffering and caused a Coxie army to march upon Washington demanding relief. The sharp crisis did not last over a year.

Our present depression may be said to have begun with the sudden collapse of the stock market two and one-half years ago. It was confidently expected that the deflation which promptly followed would set us going back on a course of recovery, and some recovery actually occurred, but it was followed by a far more serious collapse, and accompanied by the ever-growing appalling degree of unemployment. It is not at this time that lack of capital is responsible, against which much of the depression of 1893 was charged. There never was more gold in the country and the savings banks were never more replete with money than they are now. It is not lack of goods. On the contrary, there is a notorious surplus. We now witness abundance of every desirable thing in life, plenty of raw material and capital in the shape of farms and factories to maintain and increase this abundance, and all this alongside of dire poverty which touches a large part of the entire Nation.

It is estimated that at present nearly 8,500,000 persons are out of work. Unemployed may be seen anywhere one goes throughout this country. Recently I visited New York City and stumbled on a long bread line, said to be one of many to be found on Broadway. In Chicago I noted crowds of workmen trooping around employment offices. Last Monday at the city hall in Portland I saw long lines of unemployed who had received emergency work and were waiting for their pay. It is of the utmost interest to size up these men and guess their status in life, and I was struck by the apparent total absence of professional loafers and hoodlums. The men in line were clearly decent, self-respecting, and law-abiding citizens, orderly, well behaved, and even good natured. A great many appeared to be skilled laborers, and there were some white-collar men. When men of this type, able and willing to work, patiently shuffle along in long lines waiting to be fed or to be given emergency work, when scenes of this kind are multiplied a hundred thousand fold, when it is realized that a great proportion of them must have families, when we picture to ourselves the long hunt for work and the hopeless home-coming day after day, the poverty, the sickness, which promptly follows its wake, and the chances of the lowering of decent morals, then the thought is burnt into one's mind that these things should not be necessary.

Why should a large part of our population, consisting of capable and willing workers, be suffering from want and another large part be gripped with fear that it, too, will gradually move into the shadow of distress?

This question has been studied by many thinking men and by groups of men and has received, as might be expected, numberless answers. The causes have been found numerous and complex. The remedies proposed have been legion and cover a wide field, running from easier credits to unemployment insurance, from double money standard to disarmament, and from wasteful consumption to controlled production.

Much of my life has been spent in close contact with workmen on public works and in industry. I know and understand the laborer and appreciate his fine and generous qualities, his intelligence, and his adaptability. The problem before which we stand is thus unavoidably touched by the emotions and arouses deep sympathy; yet we realize that it must be viewed with a cool head if the causes are to be discovered and correct remedies are to be applied.

Contact with conditions outside the United States affords a perspective to the problem. Not long ago I visited western Europe, later Japan and coast cities of China, and recently Java and British India. It became evident to me that the higher industry was developed in any country the more intense was underemployment, and conversely the closer the bulk of the population was to the soil the less was the disturbance of economic conditions. While in England the necessity for an immense dole threatens to become chronic, the effect on the masses in China and India is infinitesimal and is practically felt only by a small upper crust of city traders and industrialists.

Much has been said, and said truly, of the bad condition of farmers, but it is only where farmers have become single-crop producers or in a sense industrialists that they have suffered as severe hardships as are now being visited upon labor out of work. Farmers as a whole may suffer deprivation, but the most essential needs are provided and they are not homeless and without work.

In a study of this subject there is one outstanding fact which may impress itself upon the student's mind as being the principal cause of our present plight—overproduction or its ally underconsumption. It is the evident result, persistently and inexorably gaining in strength, of our civilization having definitely entered upon the machine age. An early effect was noted during the first half of the nineteenth century with the introduction of railroads in England and the resistance offered by displaced stage drivers. There were labor dislocations then and later throughout the entire century, while centers of machine industry developed, means of transportation improved, and international trade was proceeding with relative freedom of obstructions; there was felt the beneficial effect of banishment of periodic shortages of foodstuffs and other necessities of life under the shadow of which humanity had existed for untold ages.

Serious dislocations of labor occurred, but there were many possibilities of realignment and emigration was as yet practically unrestricted.

Many economists have clung to the belief that the production can never exceed consumption to any great extent because of an ever rising standard of living. Such belief, however, is not borne out by the facts. The increase in production tends to proceed at a geometric ratio so long as raw materials are available. Each invention, making a step in advance with the object of cutting out labor, becomes the mother of several other inventions. Witness, for instance, the amazing development of automatic machinery, the growth in size of machine units, the constant replacement of labor by machinery.

Consumption likewise goes up, but it can not continue to increase at a corresponding rate because it is subject to serious inherent limitations which do not affect production. A man's consumption is restricted by his ability to pay and his power to enjoy. A rich man can afford to eat more than he can digest; he can buy more clothes than he can wear; own more houses, automobiles, and yachts than he can use, but he confines his consumption to what adds to his enjoyment, since more would become a nuisance.

It is therefore an unavoidable result of the introduction of machinery that there should have grown to be a spread between capacity to produce and ability to consume, a spread which is persistently widening until checked by lack of warehouse capacity or of money to be locked up in the manufacture of surplus goods.

When this argument was first advanced years ago the surplus had not grown to the proportions it has attained since. But even then the signs of overproduction were evident on all sides. It was only necessary as proof of this to note the extreme to which advertising was being carried. For many years newspapers and magazines have subsisted on advertising in an amount and of a costly type such as could only be explained by a desire to outdistance competitors and force goods on the market at all cost.

Another evidence of overproduction was the device of installment buying. This made it possible to keep the wheels of industry moving by the questionable method of mortgaging future earnings. It was sure to aggravate any future depression, should it occur, and yet was capable only of taking up some slack which in the nature of the case had a distinct limit.

Overproduction has likewise resulted in embroilments with other nations. The open door is the symbol not of humanitarian desire to help other nations by working and manufacturing goods for them but of the effort to find an outlet for surplus goods created at home. Most recent wars have had economic objects, and even the World War had overproduction of the industrial nations of Europe among its obscure causes.

With all the evils of overproduction in evidence, it is natural that it is being charged with being the main cause of our present plight, and it is upon this belief that most of the proposed remedies are based. Among these are maintaining and increasing consumption, controlling and reducing production, and adding to available credit facilities.

Many of these measures have great merit, and some of them may be necessary for emergency relief. Upon reflection, however, it would seem that the cause of our present distress lies deeper and that it is not overproduction as such that can be charged with responsibility for the distress and poverty suffered by a large part of our population.

Just because there exists a great and unnecessary abundance for all, dire need and shortage for many should not necessarily follow. It should be clear that the fault of poverty can not lie in abundance. The inevitable conclusion is that it must be found in the faulty division of this abundance.

Division of wealth produced is effected through the instrumentality of money payment for labor, raw materials and capital employed. The portion earned by labor is transmitted in the form of money wages. Whether this portion is a fair one as compared to that earned by capital and by supervising ability has been and will be the subject of constant dispute. This question is, however, not seriously involved for the present in the search for the prime cause of our economic trouble. This cause is only partially the proportion of earnings received by labor but is mainly its distribution among labor itself.

During times of overemployment, when the supply of labor is insufficient and every laborer can find work, the money wages are well spread out. Such times occurred during 1906 to 1908, when incoming immigration could hardly supply the insufficiency in the labor market. Another period of overemployment occurred during the war when 4,000,000 men were withdrawn from productive industry and when the work of the remaining population went largely into the production of war material. This condition continued for a few years after the end of the war because of the necessity of catching up with deferred building operations and delayed maintenance.

At all other times there has been unemployment. Thus there has been available a labor reservoir of idle men upon which drafts could be and were being made by industry.

There are many industries of a seasonal type, such as lake navigation, salmon packing, and lumbering, which produce underemployment during part of the year and cause a rise and fall in the stage of the surplus labor reservoir. This carries with it no special hardship, as wages in seasonal occupations are generally high so as to partly cover enforced idleness.

About the year 1885 labor began agitating for a reduction of daily labor hours from 12 to 10, and within five years the attempt was fairly successful over the entire country. The claim of labor was based entirely on humanitarian principles. Its secondary effect, however, was a reduction in the surplus labor available, thereby keeping unemployment down. Abundance of public farming land and the general opening up of the West took its quota of labor surplus.

About 1905, labor unions had grown in strength and succeeded in bringing about the reduction of hours per day from 10 to 8. On both occasions there was a general feeling on the part of employers that these sudden changes would result in shortage of commodities and a rise of prices. No such things happened owing to the rapid introduction of machinery which completely overcame the anticipated effect of reduction of hours, so that in the end the steps enforced by labor even though advocated on different principles were decidedly beneficial in keeping unemployment from swelling to dangerous proportions.

Since 1905 the introduction of machinery has continued with ever-increasing impetus. More and more labor was set free, but the war came demanding heroic increase of production, and after the war for several years there was need, as previously stated, of catching up with deferred work.

Unemployment was not seriously felt until after 1923, since which time it has grown in intensity in spite of all methods used for stimulating consumption. It was greatly aggravated by the general employment of female labor during the war, which has become permanent and suddenly added heavily to the available labor supply.

If the fact is doubted that man power is constantly being replaced by machinery, it is but necessary to study any type of industry and any class of public work. There is constant effort to cut out labor by perfection and growth in size of the machine units, aided by the universal use of electric power. It is true that part of the labor set free is taken up by employment in machine-making industry and in transportation, but there is a large remaining residue which keeps on swelling the ranks of unemployed labor. This in spite of constantly rising living standards.

Forced unemployment is repulsive to the sense of justice and is now fully recognized as lowering the average standard of living and reducing consumption, thereby aggravating the original cause.

We may now return to the main question: Is unemployment the necessary corollary of the introduction of machinery? Clearly if it is we had better consider returning to earlier, simpler, hard-working times rather than witness the injustice of a large part of our population suffering and starving. Such, indeed, is the attitude of governing classes in colonial countries. In Java, for instance, 40,000,000 hard-working peasants live contentedly on a small island from which the introduction of farming machinery is rigidly excluded.

Lightening human labor is the object of the use of machinery, but this need not mean unemployment. There is a very plain and simple way at hand to benefit from the former and avoid the latter, a way which has nothing radically new or strange in it, and which, indeed, is being proposed by many economists and labor leaders. The only strange thing about it is that it is not being stressed with greater energy and persistence as the one essential measure without which all other proposed remedies are but palliatives.

This measure is a prompt adoption of shorter working days, weeks, or months according to the exigencies of various industries, and its essence is that it should be of nation-wide scope and include all industries. Such reduction of working hours, after the two steps taken in 1885 and 1905, has been long since overdue. The point about it which must be stressed is that it should not consist of merely voluntary group employment of a local type such as put humanitarian employers at a disadvantage in competition, nor should it be confined to State or regional lines, thereby seriously disturbing competitive conditions, but it must be national in scope, cover all industries and be thoroughly applied with the one object in view of absorbing idle labor.

It was noted with interest from press accounts some weeks ago that at the Chicago conference of railroad unions and company presidents labor proposed a 6-hour day. According to reports this proposal was turned down for reasons not then stated. The only result finally emerging from this conference was a 10 per cent reduction of wages.

The attitude of the presidents may well have been that reduction of working hours would be fatal to any industry if applied to it alone, and that for the good of all railroads should be kept from the deadly effect of falling in the hands of receivers. Yet the reply might also have been that a shorter working day would be favored by the roads, provided and as soon as a shorter working day could be simultaneously enforced on all industries alike throughout the Nation.

It is realized that such measure, if it is to be brought about, requires a thoroughly awakened public opinion as to its necessity, besides a sense of frank and fair cooperation between the mass of employees on the one side and the employers on the other.

The measure might take the form of the appointment by the President of the United States of a permanent economic council, on which labor, manufacturers, contractors, railroads, engineering trades, and the power industries should have representatives. It would be the first duty of such council to ascertain from time to time the degree of time reduction necessary to reasonably absorb unemployed labor and yet permit an ever-rising standard of living.

It should recommend the passage of national and State laws governing the length of the labor day in public employment, on public works, and in the manufacture of goods in interstate traffic. Such body might be depended on to oppose other and unnecessary interference by Government with business, but it might consider other matters touching labor such as labor agencies, pensions, insurance, and safety, and publish its findings for the information of the public. Its first consideration, however, should at all times be the practical avoidance of unemployment.

As to the effect on foreign trade, it may be important but it must be remembered that this country can proceed along its own course successfully in a manner that would be impossible for any one of the smaller industrial nations of Europe. This is because the United States constitutes a large political unit, has practically a sufficiency of raw material, and has free trade within its own borders. There is no reason why this country with its enormous domestic market can not work out its own salvation, if necessary, without reference to the rest of the world.

Upon reflection it must appear axiomatic that reduction of working hours is essential before any permanent progress toward recovery can be made, and it is probable that no long time for study is required to decide upon a reduction which can be safely recommended to go into effect immediately. The president of the American Federation of Labor, previously referred to, estimates upon apparently correct data that of 30,000,000 wage earners, 8,300,000 are now unemployed. This fact alone would justify a reduction of working hours from 44 to 35 or even less per week.

If a council composed of various representative classes of labor, of industry, and of capital should reach a reasonable degree of unanimity on any measure deemed desirable, the public would quickly place itself behind it, and the lawmakers, whether municipal, State, or Federal, would respond promptly to such universal demand.

When the very difficult question of wages comes to be considered, it will be essential that both employers and employees take a cooperative attitude and that the burden of the change shall be fairly divided between producers and consumers. In unavoidable disputes it is only necessary for both sides of the problem to consider what the future might hold in store if no prompt decision can be reached. Without a reduction in the hours of labor, the number of unemployed will inevitably tend to increase, the average standard of living will most certainly be lowered, and consumption will drop, an effect which will aggravate the original cause.

The mental attitude of the unemployed will ultimately be affected by hardships and suffering so that it may become a menace to our social structure. The soviets will call attention to the injustice of our capitalistic system condemning a large part of our population to poverty in the midst of affluence and point with pride to its own system, which, with all its enormous drawbacks, has at least the advantage of avoiding unwilling idleness.

On the other hand, assume that through overwhelming force of an awakened public opinion shorter working hours are enforced on all. An immediate demand for labor will be created which would at once completely change the present hopeless psychology. Thereafter actual unemployment and the fear of unemployment would gradually disappear and in the minds of millions confidence will be reestablished, stagnation will cease, trade will resume its normal activities, and a return to healthy conditions will be possible wherein unemployment will be replaced by greater leisure and the introduction of the age of machinery will prove a blessing instead of a curse.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like now to return to page 273, section 723, stamp tax on transfer of stocks, and so forth. The first amendment is on page 274.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 274, line 7, after the word "thereof," insert "of the certificates of such corporation or other organization (or of the shares where no certificates were issued)," so as to read:

SEC. 723. STAMP TAX ON TRANSFER OF STOCKS, ETC.

(a) Subdivision 3 of Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended to read as follows:

"3. Capital stock (and similar interests), sales or transfers: On all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales or deliveries of, or transfers of legal title to any of the shares or certificates mentioned or described in subdivision 2, or to rights to subscribe for or to receive such shares or certificates, whether made upon or shown by the books of the corporation or other organization, or by any assignment in blank, or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or other evidence of transfer or sale (whether entitling the holder in any manney to the benefit of such share, certificate, interest, or rights, or not), on each $100 of par or face value or fraction thereof of the certificates of such corporation or other organization (or of the shares where no certificates were issued), 4 cents, and where such shares or certificates are without par or face value, the tax shall be 4 cents on the transfer or sale or agreement to sell on each share (corporate share, or investment trust or other organization share, as the case may be)."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not know just how much this particular amendment affects the question that I want to discuss here this morning relating to the amendment, in line 14, striking out that part of the House text which provides one-fourth of 1 per cent on the selling price of stocks on the stock exchange and the amendment striking out, on page 276, from line 10 to line 14, on page 277. Has the pending amendment any relation to those amendments?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment of the committee on page 274.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 274, line 14, after the word "that," to strike out down to and including the word "that" in line 17, as follows:

In no case shall the tax imposed by this subdivision be less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the selling price, if any, of such shares, certificates, or rights: Provided further, That.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I would like to know why the committee struck out that provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I can state it in a very few words, as it was stated in the report that it is believed this is a burdensome rate and that the provision would cause administrative difficulties. Further than that, on all purchases of stock outside of the city of New York it would impose an additional tax. The committee, I think, was unanimous in striking that provision from the bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the argument that the tax would be burdensome is not a very impressive argument so far as I am concerned. Since the committee acted on this provision there have been some developments in the investigation of the stock exchange which it seems to me justify reconsideration even by the committee.

The New York Stock Exchange in particular and the stock exchanges of the various cities of the country in general have become more or less gambling institutions wherein a few men manipulate the market in such a manner as to make tremendous profits thereby and take from the American people not thousands or hundreds of thousands but millions and even hundreds of millions and, I think it is safe to say, billions of dollars. This small tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent is just double the ordinary commission that is paid on every stock-exchange deal to the broker. In a time when we are striving to balance the Budget, in a time when we are laying taxes upon industry and business that are legitimate and which are engaged in struggling to keep themselves out of bankruptcy, the committee strikes out a tax upon these gambling institutions.

I said a moment ago they are considered gambling institutions. The scratching of the surface thus far by the Committee on Banking and Currency investigation of the stock exchange shows they are not only gambling institutions but that the market in New York is a gambling institution in which the insiders use marked cards and loaded dice. The stories that have come out already are sufficient to shock every man and woman who has any sense of decency in business relationships. Take the story of Walter Sachs, president of the Goldman-Sachs Co., who testified that he paid $23,000,000 for a company that was worth only $1,700,000, and just previously to that issued $100,000,000 worth of stock and sold it on the market at $104 a share, and to-day the stock is worth $1.75 a share, bilking the people out of $90,000,000.

Oh, but it may be said the people run their own risk when they buy these stocks. I said a moment ago that the cards were marked and the dice were loaded. What did I mean? The mere cursory investigation so far conducted shows that when the promoters of the selling of stocks at high prices indulge in this business, they place on their pay roll publicity men who become propagandists to boost in the public mind the value of the stocks. Then when the profits of the pool are collected, these men are found to be on the pay roll and they get their share of the profits.

I have read the testimony of the representatives of the stock exchange and the brokers before the Senate Committee. They argued that this tax would not produce $75,000,000 a year, as the House believed it would. They said it would bring only $32,000,000 a year. Well, whether it brings $75,000,000, whether it brings $30,000,000, whether it brings only $20,000,000, I maintain that this is one place where the Government should levy a tax for the purpose of raising revenue and for the purpose of acting as a deterrent upon this gambling institution that has grown to such proportions that to-day there are millions of people who believe the prosperity of the country depends upon whether stocks go up or down in New York. The fact of the matter is that there is much reason to believe that the break in prosperity came as a result of this unconscionable boosting and building of the stock market by such methods as I have spoken of here as employed by Mr. Sachs.

Take the case of Warner Bros., one of whom sold stock of his own company for $16,000,000, under a system of boosting values, when he himself had inside information as to dividends to be paid, and then bought his own stock back for $7,000,000, making a clear profit of $9,000,000 out of the public.

Senators, it seems to me indefensible that in the case of such an institution we should consent to take off a tax that would raise the legitimate revenue and at the same time be a deterrent to operations resulting in the wild boosting of watered stocks and propaganda by which the prices of ordinary stocks are advanced to heights that are unconscionable and unbelievable.

I know the committee defends itself because the House raised the rate of the tax on the transfer of stocks from 2 cents to 4 cents, and I know it was claimed that probably that would raise almost as much money; but let me call attention to the difference between these two kinds of taxes. A tax upon the share of stock when it is transferred is the same, whether, for instance, Radio Corporation stock is boosted to 109, as it was by the pool that cleaned up $5,000,000 for a few insiders, or whether it is less than $3 a share as it was yesterday on the stock exchange. The same tax per share is still paid. If the House provision remained in the bill, then the rate of tax would be the same, but the amount coming into the Treasury and the amount paid by the gamblers in these various stocks would be larger as the stocks mounted in price. So it seems to me that the House method of taxing stocks, even if it brought no more money, is far more desirable, because it is based upon the amount of business done and not upon the mere transfer of stock.

Then, I am impressed with another thing; that the 4-cent tax now proposed does not apply if stock is loaned to brokers. What does that mean? It means that it will not apply to short selling. Even from the White House we had a tax suggested upon short selling; even from the White House we have been told that the stock market should be curbed as to its short selling; and yet the tax proposed by the Senate committee will not reach the loaning of shares to be used in short selling.

I do not want to take much of the time of the Senate, but I did want to direct attention to the fact that in these days of desperation—and I use the word advisedly—desperation of our people, desperation almost of the Representatives and Senators to find legitimate sources to raise revenue to balance the Budget, we should not abandon the proposal to tax this institution which has become a parasite, aye, a parasite so big that it has swallowed up the legitimate business of this country, and load it merely upon a transfer of stocks to the extent of 2 cents increase.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that when the House placed that tax upon stock sales, and the stock market went down, there was a hue and cry all over the United States to the effect that it was because of the fact that this tax was placed upon such sales. The Senate committee reported an amendment to take that tax off the sale of stocks, and ever since the tax was taken off the stock market has been going down.

Mr. DILL. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. The fact of the matter is that practically every few days we read in the newspapers that "the leaders of the stock market yesterday struck new lows." The President told us when he proposed the moratorium that it was going to bring back prosperity; stocks rose; many people thought that prosperity had started to come back, and then stocks broke to lower levels than they had ever been.

Then we had before us the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, and we were told if we enacted that measure that everything would be fine; stocks began to rise again, and in a few days they dropped to new "low." Every time we do anything here in Congress to which the administration is opposed and stocks go down, we are told that is because we did not follow the President's leadership or did not do what they wanted done in New York. Then, when we do the things that the President may advocate or those in New York may advocate, stocks rise a few cents a share, and we are told that prosperity is coming back, only to find in a few days that stocks have gone even lower.

The fact of the matter is that it would be a fine thing if the Congress would pass a law to close every stock exchange in the United States during the present period of this emergency. In any case, there should be a tax levied upon the sales of stocks all over the country, first, in order to raise revenue, and, second, in order to act as a deterrent upon the practice of using the columns of the great newspapers for publicity and propaganda to build up in the public mind values until millions and millions of our people put their hard-earned savings into them and then find they own stock certificates that are not worth the paper upon which they are written, and that they are without any protection for the future because of the worthless investments they have made.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does not the bill provide for a tax on short sales?

Mr. DILL. I do not know where it does; I can not find it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. All character of short sales should be taxed. This bill does not provide for that?

Mr. DILL. The Senate committee amendment provides that when shares are loaned, not transferred on the books, the transfer tax shall not apply; and that is the most common way, as we have learned from the investigation, of carrying on short sales.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is one of the greatest gambling devices employed on the stock exchange.

Mr. DILL. Of course it is.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Take as an illustration what happened on the stock exchange yesterday. I suppose the Senator noticed that the General Electric Co. made a considerable reduction in its dividend. General Electric stock went off about $3 a share on yesterday; Westinghouse also went off, and it affected the entire stock market. I do not know the facts, but I will guarantee that 90 per cent of the stock sales yesterday were short sales on the stock exchange, running prices down all the way from one to three dollars a share.

Mr. DILL. If we are to have any tax on stocks, the tax ought to apply to all such sales, and they ought not to be exempted by some device whereby if the stocks are loaned to somebody, the tax shall not apply as provided in the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. In reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida as to short sales, the amendment proposed by the Senate committee eliminates practically a large portion of the tax on short sales, for the reason that the stock exchange does not characterize as sales stocks that are loaned but on which there has been a transaction during the day, so that the proposed amendment practically permits all those short sales for tax purposes to go scot-free of any tax whatever.

Mr. DILL. That was one of the complaints I was making.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Wisconsin is mistaken in that.

Mr. DILL. I did not hear what the Senator from Utah said.

Mr. SMOOT. I said the Senator from Wisconsin is mistaken in the statement he made in relation to short sales.

Mr. DILL. The amendment does provide that the tax shall not apply when stocks are loaned.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. DILL. That is the commonest method employed to consummate short sales.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; in connection with the selling of stocks any kind of security may be put up; it is not necessary to have the certificate of the stock which is dealt in.

Mr. DILL. I think if stocks are loaned and used for the purposes of short selling, they ought to be taxed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. REED. There is just this difference between borrowing and selling. If one makes a short sale, he has to find the stock to complete his contract. He borrows that stock and delivers it to the person to whom he has made the short sale. That sale carries a tax; it is only the borrowing that does not.

Mr. DILL. But under the committee amendment such a sale carrier no tax.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. DILL. I do not see where it does.

Mr. REED. Certainly it carries the 4-cent tax, just like any other sale.

Mr. DILL. The amendment exempts loans of stock.

Mr. REED. It provides that there shall be no tax on the borrowing of stock, but when the stock is delivered to the purchaser in a short-sale transaction it has got to pay the tax just the same.

If the Senator will indulge me a moment further——

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. REED. A very large proportion of the so-called short sales which this amendment takes care of are made under these circumstances: A constituent of the Senator in the State of Washington wants to sell stock on the New York Stock Exchange, the order is telegraphed to New York and executed. Under the rules of the New York exchange that stock must be delivered by a quarter past 2 on the following afternoon. Obviously, it is impossible to get a certificate from the State of Washington to New York City in time to make that delivery. The broker in New York, just as a matter of routine, borrows the stock in New York, delivers it on account of the contract, and then by and by the stock comes in from the State of Washington; the loan is repaid and the transaction is closed in that way. If we should put a tax on the lending as well as on the selling of stock, every person in the State of Washington who wanted to sell stock in a bona fide outright sale in order to raise money would have to pay a double tax on it. That would be wrong.

Mr. DILL. There would not be any double tax if the tax were on the selling price and did not apply to the stock. The Senator is talking about both a selling-price tax and a stock tax.

Mr. REED. How can we tax a loan on its selling price? There is not any selling price to a loan.

Mr. DILL. I do not approve of the committee amendment. I say the only proper way to levy this tax is upon the selling price of the stocks.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will indulge me one moment further, these taxes are collected through the transfer agent. The transfer agent will not make a transfer on the company's books until the proper stamp tax has been affixed. Suppose, for example, that the transfer agent finds that a certificate coming in to-day has an assignment dated perhaps six months ago. Such certificates, particularly those of stocks not paying dividends, may have been peddled around on the street for months; they are carried in the name of some street broker; they may have changed hands fifty times. How in the world is the transfer agent going to know what the price was? Such a tax could not be enforced.

Mr. DILL. It might result in breaking down the centralization of all stock deals in the great city of New York; and if it did that, it would be a God's blessing to the American people.

Mr. REED. Of course, if the Senator is going to reform the world by means of this tax, I can not meet him on that ground.

Mr. DILL. I am not going to reform the world; but I am not going to be turned aside from what I think to be a just proposal because of a system that has been worked up in this country that is a curse to the country, a curse to business, and a curse to the economic world. The fact that the Senator can dig up some transactions that would have to be stopped is no reason why we ought to avoid putting a tax upon the selling price of these stocks.

Mr. REED. It certainly is an argument against it if it is completely ineffective and unenforceable, and that is what the Finance Committee decided. We are just as pronounced in our view in the Finance Committee about this Goldman-Sachs transaction as the Senator is. Nobody is defending that.

Mr. DILL. Then why did not the Finance Committee provide for a sliding scale of tax upon the value of the stock when it was sold, instead of a flat rate of 4 cents per share, whether the stock was sold at $3, as it was yesterday in the case of the Radio Corporation, or whether it sold at $109, as it did when the pool was boosting it, and made $5,000,000?

Mr. REED. How is the Government's tax agent, or the company's transfer agent, or anybody else to know at what price the stock actually was sold? If we base our tax on the par value, as we have been doing for many years, everybody is able to calculate the amount of tax.

Mr. DILL. Let me ask the Senator a question. What is there mysterious about selling 100 shares of, we will say, United States Steel at 28 yesterday on the stock market? Nobody will have any trouble in finding out the value of that stock.

Mr. REED. Of course, they will not if the assignment comes in dated the day before it is presented for transfer.

Mr. DILL. Whether the assignment comes in or not, when the stock is delivered, it is delivered at 28. What difficulty is there about a Government agent collecting a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on that $28 a share?

Mr. REED. The stock may not be presented for transfer for another six months. How is anybody to know?

Mr. DILL. Then the sale will not be made.

Mr. REED. Of course not.

Mr. DILL. The Senator wants to continue the policy of selling futures.

Mr. REED. No; I do not.

Mr. DILL. I may be very dumb; but if stock is sold on the stock exchange at $28 a share, I can not understand how there is any difficulty on the part of the Government agent in charging one-fourth of 1 per cent tax on it. I know the stockbroker does not have any trouble in getting one-eighth of 1 per cent commission.

Mr. REED. Yes; but, if the Senator will just understand, a stock certificate assigned in blank becomes perfectly negotiable, like a dollar bill. If the stock is not paying dividends, there is no particular advantage in making the transfer into the purchaser's name. Consequently, that stock certificate, just like a dollar bill, may change hands a hundred times.

Mr. DILL. Then the Senator wants to encourage a policy of selling stocks that are never transferred. He wants to allow them to deal on margins as they deal in futures in wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade, selling millions and millions of bushels of wheat that are never there.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President. I give up.

Mr. DILL. That is the argument the Senator is making. I do not want, as I say, to delay the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question concerning his opinion of this amendment.

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It will be recalled that when the provision imposing a tax on the selling price was incorporated in the House, many messages were sent contending that the rate was so high that it would result in a prevention of transactions that are wholesome and essential. Perhaps my office received as many messages on this subject as on any other that has been brought forward in this tax bill. The contention was made that the tax was so high, especially when considered in connection with other similar taxes that are being imposed, some by State authority—for example, the tax that is imposed by the State of New York on transfers of shares—that the provision would embarrass commerce, embarrass trade in stocks.

Has the Senator gone into that question with care, and what is his view regarding it?

Mr. DILL. Of course I do not know the nature of the particular protests that the Senator from Arkansas has in mind; but it may be that they are the same kind of protests that came to me, particularly from the mining people of the Northwest, and in fact from the mining people of the country, who claimed that as the House provision as a whole was worded there would be a tax of so much upon each share traded upon the market, when they were only selling for a few cents, and that this tax would make it impossible to deal in those shares. That can be very easily remedied by providing that no tax shall exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent of the total selling price.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the provision in the bill.

Mr. DILL. That was in the bill, but it has been struck out. That part of it, I think, should be in the bill; but the whole point is this:

The brokers to-day charge 12½ cents for every $100 worth of stock that is sold on the stock exchange. If the Senator buys, or I buy, or anybody buys or sells on the stock exchange, he pays 12½ cents on every $100 of his selling price or purchase price.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is that accountable to?

Mr. DILL. To the broker who handles it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the commission?

Mr. DILL. That is the commission. This tax would be just twice that, or 25 cents for every $100. The members of the stock exchange who appeared before the Senate committee and were interviewed in the newspapers said that it would close the stock exchange, or that practically no business would be done. Well, perhaps it would. I do not think it would; but if it did deter a lot of this speculation it would be a God's blessing to the country.

I can not believe and I do not believe there is any ground for the assertion that if we impose a tax double that of the broker's commission we are going to destroy the business. I do not see where the justification for it is. Nobody finds himself seriously handicapped in paying one-eighth of 1 per cent, or 12½ cents, commission on a $100 sale. Why would it destroy the business and close all stock exchanges if we took 25 cents as a tax?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to the wording:

That in no case shall the tax imposed by this subdivision be less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the selling price.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; that is a minimum rather than a maximum.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, if the stock was selling for 4 cents a share or less it would take it all, and it would be absolutely impossible to transfer that stock.

Mr. DILL. It should be changed to "not more than one-fourth of 1 per cent," and that would very easily remedy it.

The whole point is that because the House in writing its language did not happen to cover these stocks that are sold for 4, 6, and 8 cents a share—the mining stocks, particularly, in many parts of the country—that is used as an excuse for destroying this tax. I maintain that that can be very easily amended and improved; and I shall offer an amendment that I think will meet that situation and in no way seriously interfere with the regular business of the stock exchange.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator made reference to the par value of stocks. I want to suggest to him that, according to the testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee, the greater portion of the stocks dealt in has no par value. They are stocks without par value—what are known as no-par-value stocks.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I also remark, with the permission of the Senator from Washington, that to impose a tax on par value seems to me economically unsound, because the less the taxpayer has the more he may be required to pay, relatively.

Mr. DILL. Yes; I think nobody intends to do that. To impose a tax upon the selling price, however, so that as speculation increased, as the boosting of stocks increased, the tax coming into the Treasury would increase, would act as a deterrent; and as the stocks went down, as the selling price went down, the tax coming into the Treasury would go down also.

I do not care to take any more of the time of the Senate.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the Baltimore Sun, which I send to the desk, may be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Without objection, the editorial will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of Saturday, May 28, 1932]

OUT WITH THE TRUTH!

Since the autumn of 1929, when the new economic era came crashing down around our heads, there has been one dominant idea in Washington. It is that the American people must not be told the whole truth. They may be too stupid to understand the truth. They may be too cowardly to endure the truth. They may punish any who stand boldly for the remedies that the truth dictates. Such have been the thoughts that have colored all thinking in high places.

It is more than a coincidence that this avoidance of utterly frank statement of facts has been paralleled by a downward movement in the economic life of the Nation, which has now reached a point that spreads terror among the authorities. Cause and effect are at work. The country is in a trough far deeper than could have been compelled by any or all of the grave mistakes in policy that preceded the collapse of 1929. Added to the consequence of all these mistakes in policy is what is commonly called the loss of confidence. It would be truer and more accurate to say there has been a loss of faith.

This loss of faith proceeds in large part directly from the consistent administration policy of understatement of the Nation's financial problems, from the therefore inevitable emergence of financial perils far exceeding those that had been expected, and from the corollary of increasing skepticism about the integrity of the national credit.

The time has come to make an end to that policy of shrinking evasion. The time has come to assume that the American people are not dolts or cowards, to inform them fully and honestly of the state of national finances, and to advise them of the burdens in taxation that must be shouldered if the national credit is to be protected.

It is plain that the administration and the leaders of both parties in Congress are gambling on a balance of the National Budget. It is plain that, even while they declare with all emphasis that the balancing of the Budget is the absolute condition of national solvency and of a revival of industry and trade, they are taking wide and dangerous chances that the pending tax bill will not effect a true or even a substantial balance. They are taking a chance that assertion that the Budget is balanced will be accepted as fact that the Budget is balanced.

One can understand some of the excuses. When estimates were presented and accepted last December there was hope of a revival. When, far from reviving, trade moved steadily downward and new estimates were offered in February, they also were made in the hope that a revival would soon appear, and they were accepted in that spirit. It was possible for the authorities to offer themselves the additional justification that the act of laying new taxes in large amounts and of effecting economies in large amounts would stimulate the revival. Nevertheless, in December and later in February, as in all previous statements on national finance, chances were taken on the optimistic side.

Now the time has come when it must be realized that these chances have not been made good, that even during the time the Congress has been struggling over taxes the further decline in business has been so swift and so heavy that millions more of new taxes must be levied to yield the return which will assure the balanced Budget that all proclaim to be imperative.

Stop the nonsense! It has gone on long enough. Tell the American people the full measure of the need for new taxation. Ask them to bear it. They will. The American people have sense enough, if the gentlemen at Washington will only stop to realize it, to understand the necessity of sound finance—sound in fact, not merely in name—and to bear whatever burdens sound finance may require.

What this means, in plain terms, is a general manufacturers' sales tax. It is not a question any longer whether it is a good tax or a bad. It is now an absolutely necessary tax. There is not a man in Washington, possessed of information about the state of business and the state of the National Treasury, who does not know quite well that it is impossible to get enough revenues without resort to this tax, and probably to a sales tax on beer in addition. Why not tell the truth, and why not act on the truth?

In particular, why not a plain statement of the facts from President Hoover? He knows what the state of business is. He knows what the state of the National Treasury is. He knows that the day is here when only a manufacturers' sales tax will balance the Budget. And yet, though he leads all others in insistence upon the necessity of a balanced Budget, not one explicit word has he ever uttered in behalf of the tax that will accomplish a balanced Budget. The hour has stuck when the Chief Magistrate of the American people must talk facts to the American people.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not know what was the object in having that article read, unless it was to bring to the attention of the Senate as a fact that the sales tax is all important.

We need not fool ourselves, and the country need not be fooled, as to the true situation here in the Senate. There are some of us who have laid our breasts bare to every target in order to help make receipts and expenditures balance. In the Committee on Finance and on the floor we voted for this and that tax, which met the approval of the Treasury Department, may I say, although in many cases we knew that doing so was unpopular. But we had read the press of the country, we had listened to those in high places in the administration, we had analyzed government receipts and disbursements, and we appreciated that it was necessary to preserve the credit of the country. So we went through with it.

We have done it unflinchingly and courageously. Some of us have voted for these taxes when others have faltered and floundered and deserted. I have no fault to find with those who want this or that plan with reference to balancing the Budget; but what is the situation that confronts the country to-day?

We have proceeded for some weeks in the Committee on Finance, and many days and nights in the Senate, voting on this item and that item, and we have reached almost the end of the road. There are very few other items to be considered. We have finally overcome every obstacle. We have almost balanced the Budget, according to the recommendations of the Treasury Department. When we shall have finished the consideration of these few remaining items, we will have balanced the Budget within $40,000,000 of the amount the Treasury said was required.

I am not going to argue the point whether or not the Treasury was mistaken in its estimates. I have always believed from the beginning that as to some of the sources of revenue recommended we were going to fall short of receiving the amount the Treasury estimated we would receive, and that on others they have underestimated the receipts. For instance, I thought they had overestimated the receipts from income and surtaxes and corporation taxes, because, as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary said when they appeared before the committee, their estimates were based on an expected 20 per cent improvement in business for this year, and we have not seen the improvement.

Be that as it may, the Treasury made its recommendations. It specified what particular things should be taxed in order that the Budget might be balanced, and we accepted those recommendations; and, over many obstacles, we have finally emerged to the present point in the consideration of the measure and have almost completed a bill that will balance the Budget.

We need about $40,000,000 more, or $70,000,000 more, according to the estimates of the Treasury Department, in order to balance the Budget; and, so far as I am concerned, when we shall have finished the consideration of the bill I am perfectly willing to accept sufficient increases in income or normal taxes, according to the plan suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], in order to balance the Budget, and I think there are enough of us who are willing to join hands to put that through. So there is no question but that the Budget is going to be balanced if we will proceed along the orderly lines mapped out by the committee, suggested by the Treasury Department.

What has happened? After we have voted in this item and that item, and finished our labors, we read in the papers now that the President has called to the White House the leading newspaper owners of the country, and that, in a long conference there, there was discussed the general sales tax, which has been before the country from the time the bill was first introduced or suggested by the President. Indeed, we hear many rumors as to what happened in that conference.

The President has not come out for a general sales tax, but I hear it intimated and rumored here and there by Senators that they are against a general sales tax, but that if the President should come out in favor of it they would be for it.

The Treasury Department has been against a sales tax. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, when he appeared before the committee, indicated that he was against it, and in his utterances the Secretary of the Treasury has been against it. Of course, he finally said, "If that is the best way to balance the Budget, and Congress will accept it, very well; I will accept it to balance the Budget, because that is the one essential."

We see now, however, that every effort, every influence, is being employed to try to browbeat the Senate into undoing the work it has done and to accept the general sales tax. The movement for a sales tax has been at work for weeks. Those who are its proponents knew they were defeated. They never dreamed in the committee that they could muster enough votes to recommend it to this body. They put it off as long as they could, although some of us were pleading with them from the beginning to put it to a vote in the committee in order that we might settle it. Upon the floor of the Senate we have appealed to those who have favored a general sales tax to put it before the Senate and let Senators vote on it. Have they done that? No; but they go out into the anteroom, they get some of the press boys around them, and they say, "We have the votes." They know they have not the votes. They know they have not had the votes. They know that there has not been a moment since the time when we started the consideration of the bill when they have had the votes.

Certain press representatives, certain big papers in this country, have favored a general sales tax; they have tried to exploit it; they have propagandized the country; and they have made people believe that there was a tremendous force here for the general sales tax, and that it was going to be adopted.

If they have the votes, I challenge them now to take a vote this minute, without any more discussion of the proposition. They have not the votes, and they know they have not.

I was surprised to read this morning that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, whom I respect, and with whom I have labored and cooperated in this tax fight, was yesterday at the White House, and in leaving it said, "The general sales tax is growing and growing and growing."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. When yesterday I suggested to the leader on the other side of the aisle that we try to hasten the consideration of the pending bill and get it out of the way to-day, he said, "Oh, no; we must wait until Monday."

We must wait until Memorial Day, because the greatest service and the most patriotic thing we could do would be to work on this proposition Monday. In my opinion, the worst thing the Senate could do would be to adopt a general sales tax on Memorial Day, when the stores are closed and the church bells are ringing, and people are taking the day off to decorate the graves of their loved ones who have passed away.

Why the proponents of the sales tax want to put off a vote is because they think they can browbeat the Senate in some way and can get enough votes to pass the sales-tax amendment. They know they have not the votes to-day. They think they might have them Monday, and if they do not have them then, they will want to put it off until Tuesday.

Let the country know that we are ready for a vote. I say to the boys in the press gallery to send out the word, no matter whom you represent, that we are ready for the vote, and that if there is any delay in passing this bill it will be through the efforts of those who have been crying out heretofore to pass the bill and balance the Budget, and that everything would be well if we would do that. They are the ones who are delaying it, if there is any further delay.

Now I yield to my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that there is not a single, solitary word of truth in the article in the morning paper, so far as it represents me as saying anything about the sales tax.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. SMOOT. I visited the President yesterday. I did not mention the sales tax; never mentioned it. I am perfectly willing to say what I went to the White House about. I went there on the question of silver, and not another subject was mentioned during the conference I had with the President.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course I believe absolutely what the Senator says. That shows the extent to which the press is going in carrying out this propaganda, which was hatched the other night, even saying that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has worked overtime, and who has voted time after time for the taxes which have been suggested, as many of us here have, had gone to the White House and was helping in this propaganda.

Let Senators and the press and the business people and others who may want the general sales tax mark this, that if they really want to balance the Budget, and think the sales tax will help, let us have a vote on the sales tax now. But the proponents of the sales tax are not going to agree to that. Stop this propagandizing; stop this delaying. But they are not going to allow a vote on the sales tax, because it is inconceivable to me that they want to have a general sales tax. Why, the Senate unanimously voted out the tax on toilet articles, but now it is said that they want to put back the tax on tooth paste. The tax was taken off mouth wash, but now they say they want to put it back on that. It was taken off soap, but now they want to put it back on that. Under a general sales tax, from the time one is born until he finally passes away and is carried in his coffin to the graveyard everything he uses, except the things he eats and the clothes he wears, is taxed.

Just as an illustration, when you get out of your bed and go into your bathroom you wash your face in a bowl that is to be taxed, you use soap that is to be taxed, you use a toothbrush that is to be taxed, the tooth paste you use is to be taxed, your shaving cream will be taxed, the shaving brush will be taxed, the comb you use and the brush you use will be taxed. When you go to your office you will find everything in your office taxed. When you go to eat your breakfast, everything except the food will be taxed, from the old skillet to the stove, and the pans, and the spoons, dishes, and the cups. Everything will be taxed. Not to carry the picture further, from the time you are born until you are laid away in your coffin everything will be taxed, and even the coffin itself will be taxed.

It is inconceivable to me that in this democratic country, where we have said that the taxes should be heaviest upon those things which are luxuries, and which the people do not have to have, that some should want to tax everything, irrespective of whether the poor man needs it or the rich fellow wants it. I am not willing to do that. Whenever you put your tax on here, Mr. Business Man in New York who is using his telephone to put over the general sales tax, Mr. Automobile and Mr. Rubber interests, Mr. Jeweler, and others, remember when you do that, if you want business revived, you are not helping in the movement because you are but delaying the balancing of the Budget. You are confusing the issue.

There are men here by the score who will not vote for the bill on final passage with a general sales tax in it. Whenever you put into this bill such a provision, and it goes to the House containing such a provision, there will be created a situation thereby that will be impossible to overcome. The House once by 70 and later by 75 votes has repudiated the idea. I went over there only yesterday and I talked with everyone I could find on the Democratic side, and not one but told me he did not know of a single man on the Democratic side who has changed his opinion regarding the sales tax.

We have practically balanced the Budget and are through with our labors. Why continue to confuse the issue and mislead the people on the issue?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. In the light of what the Senator has said, I want to call his attention to a statement in this morning's Herald, as follows:

> President Hoover stands foursquare behind the general manufacturers' sales tax as the best method of balancing the Federal Budget, Senator SIMEON D. FESS, of Ohio, declared last night.
> The Ohioan made this announcement after an extended White House conference to discuss the general legislative situation and also the approaching presidential campaign.

I think it might be well to find out whether or not the statement attributed to the present occupant of the chair is also false and whether or not the President is in favor of the sales tax.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it would be interesting also to know why this statement or announcement from the Senator from Ohio has been deferred, why the announcement was not made in the beginning of the consideration of the bill. Undoubtedly such a course would have resulted in the passage of the bill much earlier than it could be passed if a sales tax were now incorporated and the bill sent back to the House of Representatives containing such a provision. I would like to hear some one who has been propagandizing the country in favor of the prompt balancing of the Budget by the passage of the revenue bill answer the question how long he thinks it will be before the bill will be finally passed if a general sales tax is now incorporated in the bill.

We have heard it whispered about and some statements have been made in the press that there has been a reversal of attitude on the part of the House of Representatives touching this very important question. No doubt those who have made that statement are sincere in the belief that a change has occurred. But upon investigation it is found that there has been no material change. Those who are desirous of having a prompt balancing of the Budget can never explain or excuse their conduct in failing to bring forward the general sales-tax issue when the bill was first brought into the Senate. They can never explain or justify waiting week after week until the physical resources of Members of the Senate have been almost exhausted in the consideration of the bill, and then precipitating an issue which will defer the final passage of the bill for 30 or 60 days.

Let us understand why secret propaganda has been promoted. Is it true that the President, after the Congress has been in session for six months, has announced or prompted the announcement of a policy touching the taxation question which is at variance with the policy advanced by the Treasury Department? If that be true, let us have the explanation of it now and let the country understand that instead of causing a prompt balancing of the Budget, it will result in further confusion and delay. It will prolong the debate over the tax bill for at least 30 days.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope and I expect that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is going to deny the statement. I hope that is true, because it may be some of the same propaganda. I had believed and I had hoped that the President would stand aloof and let the Congress enact its Budget legislation as it thought wise. I know that the Secretary of the Treasury, who came before the Finance Committee at least three times and was pleaded with to make suggestions, never at any time made a recommendation for a general sales tax. He made the suggestion of excise taxes upon a special basis and laid it down in black and white before the committee. He has never suggested a general sales tax.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the article in the Washington Herald of this morning was called to my attention over the telephone by several persons asking me whether it was authentic. I had not seen the Herald until after the Senate convened at 10 o'clock this morning. I had seen the Washington Post. There is not anything stated in the Post that is not true. The facts are, that I called for a conference with the President last night.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Post did not quote the Senator as the Herald quotes him.

Mr. FESS. The Post refers to me as having been at the White House and refers to matters that were discussed, but nothing of the sort as stated in the Herald.

Mr. HARRISON. I see.

Mr. FESS. I asked for a conference at the White House over the preliminaries of the national convention, making it quite emphatic that it now appears that Congress is not going to get through with its work so we can recess for the convention. It looks as if we are going to be compelled to stay right here through the convention. Some of us will have to go to the convention anyway. I assume the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] will have to go. I intend to leave here on the 8th of June and to remain absent until after the convention is over. There are many subjects that ought to receive preliminary consideration, and naturally they come up for the chairman of the national committee to consider. Some of those I called to talk about with the President before we came to any definite decision. Everybody would understand that as an obvious situation, a thing that any chairman would feel under obligation to do.

As I left the White House last night I was met by several newspapermen. They wanted to know what was the subject of the discussion. Naturally I told them why I was there. Then they began to ask me questions. One question was whether we discussed the referendum. I stated flatly that we had not, that that was not a subject which I had gone to the White House to discuss. Yet in the Herald is a statement that we did discuss the referendum and also a statement as to the position of the President. There is not a scintilla of fact in that statement.

I know that in the course of the conversation with the newspaper boys, and there were four of them there, I was asked about the tax situation and whether we had discussed that matter. I stated that we had, but that the subject of discussion was the progress we were making on tax legislation. The sales tax was not discussed. No particular phase of discussion was entered into except as to the probability of our reaching a vote soon.

I was asked what is the position of the President on the sales tax. I frankly stated that I was of the opinion that as between the excise tax and the sales tax the President would be in favor of the sales tax. I did not quote the President because he said nothing of the sort to me at all. I gave it simply as an opinion of my own. Probably I should not have done it, but now comes the statement as from me, as reported in the press, that I stated that the President is flatly behind the sales tax. There is absolutely no truth in that statement. In the first place, I would not quote the President even if he had stated any such thing as that, but he did not state anything of the sort and I do not know of my own knowledge the position of the President on the sales tax. I gave it as my opinion that as between the high excise taxes and the sales tax, the President would prefer the sales tax, but I made the statement without any authority except that it was my own judgment.

That is all there is to the statement in the Herald about prohibition and the referendum, which assumes that we discussed that question, and also about the sales tax, which assumes that I was quoting the President as being for the sales tax when I do not know what his position is.

It is along the same line that there seems to be an effort to draw a Senator into complications where some statement will be made and then immediately somebody identified with the statement will call me up and ask whether I said it. In other words, in their inability to get me to talk on a thing about which I am not talking, somebody will print it as if I had talked upon it and then call me up and ask me whether I did or not. That is a high grade of conduct on the part of men who represent the great press of the country.

Yesterday I made a statement relative to Senators coming into the Chamber late when the Senate met at 10 o'clock, a matter which had been discussed here. Commenting on that statement, the same news agency which had prepared the previous statement for the press, said "The Senate is very anxious to make the country believe that its Members are very studious and busy."

It is all right, perhaps, for members of the press to make such statements to people who understand the circumstances, but I contend that it is not a service but is a disservice to the country to utilize this as an open season for shooting at public officials who are trying to do their best to meet the problems with which they are confronted. It is not treating the country properly when such distortions as appear in the press this morning are printed without scruple. It seems to me there ought to be some change in attitude on the part of the press.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, so long as the general sales-tax question has been raised this morning, I wish to indorse what the Senator from Mississippi has said with respect to delay in balancing the Budget and to discuss the question involved.

If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] should not be offered, we could balance the Budget before we adjourned to-night. If there shall be any delay in balancing the Budget by the injection of the sales-tax proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts, the responsibility for the delay and for failing to balance the Budget within a month or six weeks will be upon the shoulders of those who sponsor and support the proposition. The responsibility will not be upon those who are now supporting the bill as reported by the Finance Committee.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. In a conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury yesterday afternoon he stated to me, basing his estimate on the condition of the bill the night before at the time the Senate adjourned, that we had provided $969,000,000 of additional revenue, but that he thought it would be absolutely unsafe to undertake to balance the Budget with $969,000,000 of additional revenue unless the reduction in expenditures to be made by the economy program was greater than he thought might be made. He said that to be absolutely safe, to make sure that the Budget would be balanced, so that the country and the world would be satisfied that it had been balanced rationally, it would require $1,025,000,000 of additional revenue and a reduction in expenditures of $350,000,000.

The Senator from Michigan has stated that we can balance the Budget to-night. He is a member of the Finance Committee; he has studied all these questions and is familiar with them. I am wondering, having provided for raising revenue to the amount of $969,000,000 and it being necessary to have $1,025,000,000, where we are going to get the other $56,000,000?

Mr. COUZENS. Just how we are going to get that $56,000,000 may be left to the Senate. There are several ways of raising it. We can adopt the proposal of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], which will produce from $100,000,000 to $125,000,000 more, and then not go back to the war-time income-tax rates which I recommended. To adopt the Connally amendment will more than balance the Budget, and it will be better to more than balance the Budget than to have it unbalanced.

However, that is not exactly the purpose for which I rose. I rose to say that it would take a month or six weeks, probably, to debate the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield there?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator's statement be accurate, and if it be true, as the Treasury Department states, that each day we are losing $8,000,000 while we postpone the passage of the pending measure, a delay of 30 days would mean a loss of $240,000,000. Whether the statement of the Treasury is accurate or not I do not know, but we have been told that each day we delay the passage of the pending measure the deficit in the Treasury becomes $8,000,000 greater.

Mr. COUZENS. I understood the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to say the deficit increased at the rate of $2,000,000 a day.

Mr. BARKLEY. The press has carried the statement that it was $8,000,000 a day; but even if the sum be $2,000,000, if we delay the passage of the bill for 30 days that would be $60,000,000, and that is more than the $56,000,000 now necessary to balance the Budget.

Mr. COUZENS. Every day we delay the passage of this bill to discuss theories of taxation, whether it be excise taxes on a few commodities or the surtax or other kinds of taxes, we are delaying the balancing of the Budget and are losing probably more in revenue day after day than we can gain by a change in the method of taxation.

Briefly, I want to point out some of the difficulties that will arise and some of the interpretations that will have to be arrived at when we are considering the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I want to draw attention to some of the exemptions his amendment proposes, how they will have to be interpreted, and the necessity of an interpretation of what the amendment means before we act upon it.

I want to say that there will be literally hundreds of amendments proposed to the amendment, because the amendment, as I view it, is already too inclusive of the necessities of life. For instance, beginning with the exemptions on page 5 of the amendment, it provides:

(1) Food for human or animal consumption (including those grades and forms of articles chiefly used as food for human or animal consumption in the form in which sold or after processing or as material for such food) and tea and coffee.

I think it would require a very long definition properly to determine what is intended by "food * * * including those grades and forms of articles chiefly used as food."

Then in subparagraph (2) the amendment provides—

Medicines—

Then in parenthesis—

(other than patent or proprietary medicines).

I should like to ask the Senator when he excludes proprietary medicines he means the——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that we refrain from discussing my amendment until it shall be reached in the consideration of the pending measure? I think that would be much more orderly procedure and possibly save time.

Mr. COUZENS. I dislike to disagree with the Senator's suggestion, but the Senator knows that the most intensive propaganda is now proceeding in order to induce Senators to vote for this proposed plan. Not only 39 newspaper publishers, I understand, have been pledged but it is even whispered around the Senate that the Scripps-Howard publications are going to switch and come out for the sales-tax plan; and it is also whispered around that Mr. Roy Howard has already been induced to switch over and indorse the sales-tax plan. I do not propose to sit here and wait until next week, when this propaganda may influence a sufficient number of Senators to enable the sales tax to be put in this bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator knows that this proposal did not come from the administration or the Treasury Department but from the Democratic members of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not saying it did; I am saying where the source of it now is.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator knows that propaganda, if there is propaganda, has been of recent origin and of recent intensity, and that when this proposal was first offered by the Ways and Means Committee there was very little propaganda for it.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not disagreeing with the Senator as to that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator, of course, may criticize and discuss the amendment as he sees fit, but I really would prefer that the debate should be delayed until we reach and may discuss the amendment section by section, and until I can give my reasons for supporting it and can enumerate the objections to it. I propose to enumerate every objection of which I have heard and to give what seems to me to be an explanation in reply to the objections.

Mr. COUZENS. Out of consideration for the Senator——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say this regarding the amendment that it is similar to the provision drafted by the House Ways and Means Committee; that it was drafted by the experts of the Treasury; it was modeled after the Canadian plan; and a great deal of time and a great deal of study have been given to the matter by experts of our Government. They think they have drafted a workable amendment. It has defects; it is not perfect; it perhaps can be improved; but it is, on the whole, as satisfactory a manufacturers' excise tax as could be drafted.

Mr. COUZENS. Out of respect for the Senator's wishes, I will not ask him any question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I appreciate that.

Mr. COUZENS. In discussing the amendment, I think it is fair to its proponents to point out some questions that will be raised and some of the amendments that will be offered for consideration before it can be voted on by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want, when I have an opportunity to present the amendment, to explain its provisions. I hope to give to the Senate the arguments that are in favor of it; I hope to present every known and repeated argument against it, and to give my views in reference to the weight that should be attached to those objections.

There are objections to it just as there are objections to the excise taxes proposed in this bill, but not one objection can be lodged against a single tax proposed to be levied by the amendment than can be lodged against the tax now in the bill on candy, on chewing gum, on radios, on automobiles, on tubes and tires, and many other articles, except that in my amendment the rate is infinitely smaller than in the bill which is now before the Senate.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course I disagree with the Senator that there are not great objections to the proposal, because it covers the whole field of human needs except food and cheaper clothing. If the excise taxes are objectionable—and I agree that they are—they are confined to a few articles; but the objections to the Senator's amendment can be multiplied by the number of articles that would be included in it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Suppose I came here with an amendment providing for a tax of 1¾ per cent on expensive furniture, on rugs, on carpets, on draperies, on laces, on linen, on chinaware, on silverware, and 100 or more other commodities that the well-to-do and prosperous purchase, would the Senator object to such a tax?

Mr. COUZENS. I do not desire a consumption tax, because I am conscious of the fact that the only way to employ our unemployed is to supply more luxuries.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is there not just as much justification for the kind of taxes I have suggested as for the special excise taxes levied by this bill?

Mr. COUZENS. Absolutely; there is no question about that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then I think the Senator will give me credit for eliminating, as far as it is humanly possible and so far as is possible of administration, every single necessity of life which the worker and the poorer classes of our population consume.

Mr. COUZENS. That is where the Senator and I wholly disagree. I do not believe the Senator has eliminated from his amendment one-half the things that ought to be eliminated.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator can not deny statistics, and statistics show that 73 per cent of the earnings of the workers goes for food, clothing, and rent. That has been shown by test after test and examination after examination.

I will concede that in this amendment it is proposed to tax part of the 27 per cent income of some of the working class, but from that must be deducted expenditures for amusements and for other incidentals of life that are not reached and are not in the category of purchases. I repeat, that examination after examination as to how the income of the worker is spent shows that over 70 per cent is spent for food, clothing, and rent, and they are all exempted by the amendment; indeed, the amendment provides a tax on the rich and wealthy of the country, who because of their wealth have the most money to spend, and is an amendment to free and liberate the poor from taxation so far as it is possible to do it by law.

Mr. COUZENS. I could argue for months and months, and be wholly in disagreement with the Senator's viewpoint that what he proposes is a tax on the rich. It is obviously a tax on the poor, because, as the Senator's own candidate for the Presidency, Mr. Alfred Smith, pointed out, an individual with an income of $1,000 under this proposal for a sales tax would pay $8.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not care what Mr. Smith or anybody else said, I repeat, it provides the revenues necessary to run the Government from the wealthy consumers and reduces to a minimum the tax burden on the poor.

Mr. COUZENS. I am telling the Senator what the proponents of the measure say.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am trying to treat this on a broad basis. I enumerated 10 or more articles, and the Senator has just agreed with me that there is just as much reason for taxing those articles as there is for taxing the commodities mentioned in the bill pending before us. Indeed, there is more reason, because the things I have named—the laces and the linens and the carpets and the rugs and the art and the china and the bric-a-brac and the silverware—are purchases that will be particularly used by the rich, and be subject to this tax.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to ask the Senator whether the poor live in bare houses?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly not.

Mr. COUZENS. Do the poor have to get along without carpets and rugs and kitchen utensils and chairs and kitchen tables and knives and forks and napkins?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No, Mr. President; but the poor have to use for 20 years the tableware from which they eat, the furniture in their homes, and the other commodities they use. They are not every six months or every year or every three years buying these expensive commodities as styles change, and the Senator knows it well.

Mr. COUZENS. Those things are not exempted in this bill. If the Senator wants to get at the point he desires, and with which I am in agreement, why does he not present an excise tax on the commodities to which he has just referred? If he does, I shall be glad to support it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator can enumerate to me the things that he wants to eliminate from this bill that will exempt the poor from every tax, I will agree with him; but he can not do it, and I will tell him why. He can not eliminate the tablecloth of the poor that costs 50 cents unless he eliminates the tablecloth of the rich that costs $100.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes; I can.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. He can not eliminate the wash towel that the poor buy in the 5-and-10-cent stores for 5 cents unless he eliminates the towel that costs $1, $5, $10, or more.

Mr. COUZENS. I disagree with that entirely. The Senator's own bill indicates that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let the Senator draw an amendment, and name in that amendment every commodity that the worker and the poor consume, and I will accept it.

Mr. COUZENS. That is just what I rose to say.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But I will tell the Senator that he is limited to about 10 per cent of the expenditures of the poor, because 70 per cent is eliminated under this bill.

Mr. COUZENS. It will be my intention to eliminate the other 30 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator can not do it. Some of it goes when the poor man goes to church on Sunday. Some of it goes when he goes to the movie. Some of it goes when he goes to the baseball game. Some of it goes for things that are not and can not be eliminated from a tax bill.

Mr. COUZENS. We are going to eliminate them just as far as we can; and I thought it was due to the Senator and due to the other advocates of the sales tax to notify them how long it would take to get this bill through, not only because of the misunderstandings but because of the lack of adequate exemptions.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator and I absolutely agree that if we are going into the excise-tax business we want every single thing excepted that the poor eat and wear. I am with him in that. Let him draw the amendment, and I will accept it.

Mr. COUZENS. I point out also that there are 10 pages, I am informed, of exemptions under the Canadian law. Let me say that I am not influenced by what the Canadians do in raising their taxes any more than I am influenced by what the British do in raising their income taxes, although I want to point out the great difference between the income-tax rates paid by British citizens and the income-tax rates paid by American citizens.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I hope the Senator will at least admit that if we were going into the field of a general manufacturers' excise tax, this amendment was drawn as fairly as could be expected in undertaking a new venture of this character and kind. I will agree that he can name towels, he can name tablecloths, he can name chairs, he can name tables in the homes of the poor that this does not reach; but I have not been able to get experts to advise me just where to draw the line between the $1 chair and the $100 mahogany parlor chair.

Mr. COUZENS. Let me point out to the Senator that he has attempted it by putting a tax on suits over $35 and shoes over $5, and he excepts only a very few articles.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As the Senator knows, that was my own idea, because the proposal of the House Ways and Means Committee exempted all clothing and all shoes. I could not understand why a woman who was willing to pay $10 or more for a pair of shoes, or a man who could import his clothing from abroad and pay $100 or $150 for an overcoat, should not pay a tax. That is why I provided that those who buy the cheaper clothing and the cheaper shoes should be exempt, and only those who could buy expensive clothing and expensive shoes should be taxed. If that can be done in the field of furniture and in the field of table linen and bedding, I will go along with the Senator; but I want to tell him that it is a difficult thing to do. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to do.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator has raised the very question I wanted to raise. I know he is sympathetic with exempting those articles.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am for it, and I will try between now and Monday to see if it can be done; but I want to impress upon the Senator that it is a very difficult thing. I also want to impress upon him that the poor are not in the stores buying china, they are not buying crockery, they are not buying knives and forks, they are not buying linens and towels, every day or every week. These things have to last them a lifetime, and the burden upon them is very light, though it is there.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator certainly does not mean to imply that those living on incomes of less than $2,000 a year, which are exempted under the income-tax brackets, do not have to replenish their napkins and bedclothing and household utensils?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; but the figures I will give later come from the Senator's own city and State. A canvass was made and an examination was made, and months were devoted to it, to find out where the expenditures of the workers in the Ford factory went, how they were divided; and, I repeat, the statistics showed that 73 per cent of their expenditures went for food, clothing, and rental, and they are all eliminated from this bill. What the worker spends for other purposes is a very small percentage of his wages.

Mr. COUZENS. I disagree with the Senator that rent is eliminated from this bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is no tax upon any existing building or institution in this country. It is true that if the Senator or I or anybody else undertakes to build a home to-morrow we will be subject to this tax.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; and all repairs will be subject to the tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But is it not a fact that the owners of property base their rent upon the cost of duplicating the building, or, at least, that is an important factor in the rents charged? Therefore, if this tax goes into effect and has the tendency, which I contend it will have, to increase the cost of duplicating these buildings, that factor will be taken into consideration in fixing the rent on existing buildings.

Mr. COUZENS. There is no question about it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly that is true to a degree. I do not claim for a moment that there is not going to be some burden upon this class of people; but it is insignificant compared with the burden that there will be upon the man who builds a $500,000 home. It is inconsequential. It goes up and up and up as the cost increases. Unless conditions change rapidly there will not be many homes built by the workers, and rents give no promise of increase.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to answer some of these questions that the Senator raises before he completes his speech.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator invited me to interrupt him. I did not seek the floor. I say now that I think we are just going over the ground again and again. I much prefer to present my views when the amendment is moved and to answer questions at that time rather than to have to go over the ground again.

Mr. COUZENS. I said to the Senator a while ago that I would not ask him any more questions, but I would just inform him and his supporters in the sales tax of some of the things that were yet to be considered and the length of time it would take to have them properly considered before we could possibly vote on his amendment. I thought it was a friendly gesture to those who were proposing to put this amendment over to be advised in advance as to what the contentious points would be with respect to it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I just want to say one thing further, if the Senator will permit me. The only difference between my proposal and what is in the bill is this: The bill provides for taxes upon certain special commodities or goods and articles at a high rate. My proposal levies the tax at a greatly reduced rate in the same fashion, in the same manner, without pyramiding, but it takes in all goods and all commodities except those that the working class purchase as necessities of life.

Mr. COUZENS. I disagree with the Senator in his statement that there is not pyramiding. It can not be avoided.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If there is pyramiding in this bill, there is pyramiding in mine. It is the same system. Taxes are levied upon commodities in the same way.

Mr. COUZENS. I understand that; but there is pyramiding in all sales taxes, and that is what I am trying to demonstrate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Nobody disputes it. That is already in the bill on hundreds of special manufactured articles.

Mr. COUZENS. I have never supported any of the excise taxes in this bill. I never have been in favor of a tax on consumption. Every single cost of production is pyramided.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. WHEELER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of both the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts if either one of these classes of taxes by itself will balance the Budget, in their definite opinion?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In my opinion, they will not. In my opinion, no bill that we will draft or propose to draft here will do it; but I will say about my proposal that it seeks to raise all the money that is provided for in the Senate bill with an increase of $40,000,000 to take care of the loss that has been sustained by reason of changing the exemption on admissions.

Mr. GLASS. I understand, then, that the Senator's amendment is proposed as a substitute for the so-called nuisance taxes?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Absolutely. It is to strike out all the nuisance taxes and propose a general manufacturers' tax.

Mr. GLASS. If we should strike out all the nuisance taxes we would strike out the whole bill, because all taxes are nuisances, for that matter.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; of course—the so-called nuisance or sales taxes.

Mr. GLASS. But what I want to reach is whether we might not retain the nuisance taxes and adopt the Senator's proposal also, and thereby come nearer balancing the Budget.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It undoubtedly would assure the balancing of the Budget more nearly than any other proposal that has been made.

Mr. GLASS. I am utterly opposed to going to the country upon the false pretense that we are balancing the Budget when we are not balancing the Budget.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the only advantage that these excise taxes have over the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts is that each specific item is definitely taxed. The people know they are taxed. The people can buy or refrain from buying. The proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts, however, is what the propagandists call a painless tax. They want it concealed. They want it extracted from the people without knowing that it is being extracted. Telegrams and letters I am receiving in support of the sales tax say that it is a fair and equitable tax because it is a painless tax. It is a definite drive to extract millions and hundreds of millions of dollars from the pockets of the people of the United States without their knowing about it.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if all the manufacturers involved in this proposed tax do not constitute a privileged class, and if they are not to-day under the guise of a tariff exacting tribute from every consumer in this country?

Mr. COUZENS. I do not know all the articles that are covered by a tariff; but——

Mr. GLASS. Would not the Senator say, in general, that that is true?

Mr. COUZENS. I think, in general, that that is true.

Mr. GLASS. Then there are some of us who are inclined to vote for this proposition, although I am not definitely committed to it, because it would mean a drawback from this privileged class.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not know whether the Senator is predicating those remarks on the theory that the producers are going to absorb this tax or not.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; my understanding is that the producers are going to absorb the tax. I understood that the proposition was so hedged about that the tax could not be pyramided.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator has any such idea as that, we will have to disillusion him before we get through.

Mr. GLASS. I questioned the Senator from Michigan the other day, and I understood him to reply that under the Canadian system the consumers did not have to pay the tax.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstood me. What I said was that under the Canadian system, and under the proposed amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, a very great deal of pyramiding is obviated, it is true. The licensing system contained in the law in Canada, and in the Senator's amendment, does prevent a lot of pyramiding, but it does not prevent all of it. There is no human possibility of preventing pyramiding in connection with any production tax.

Mr. GLASS. The difference with the Senator's proposition, as the Senator from Michigan concedes, is that we will derive millions of dollars of revenue toward the support of the Government, applying the burden, as I conceive is intended, upon a privileged class which does not pay a dollar of revenue to the Government, but levies tribute upon every consumer of every article they manufacture in this country.

Mr. COUZENS. But the Senator predicates that statement on the view that the manufacturer who is alleged to have received the benefits of the tariff absorbs the tax. That is not so. Every one of these taxes will be passed on to the consumer, and even the strongest advocates of the general sales tax claim in their arguments that it is an easy and a painless tax, passed on to the people of the United States.

Mr. GLASS. That is the only excuse for a high tariff, and it is the only reason why the American people have not sense enough to wreck this high tariff policy.

Mr. COUZENS. Anybody who approves of the general sales tax is just adding to what the Senator from Virginia is now complaining about.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. One of my reactions to the general sales tax proposal when it was first inaugurated years ago was the belief that it was originally designed ultimately to eliminate income taxes from this country so as to substitute a general sales tax as a permanent system of taxation on the people of the United States, in the hope that after a while it would be substituted for the income tax. The so-called nuisance taxes in this bill, if they are as irksome as represented, will be repealed earlier than they would otherwise be, and, as a matter of fact, the 2-year limit applies to all of them in the bill. If they are as irksome as it is claimed, we may assume that the people will demand their repeal as early as possible, and that the revolt against them will be so noticeable that they will not be extended beyond the 2-year period unless our present situation should continue. But if its proponents do succeed in engrafting upon our taxing system a general sales tax, does the Senator believe we shall ever be able to get rid of it as a part of the permanent taxing system in this country? I would like to have his views.

Mr. COUZENS. In a statement I made on Friday the 13th I pointed out clearly that the movement back of the sales tax is one of the most subtle campaigns to eliminate the income tax. The junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] read in the Finance Committee—as I think the Senator from Kentucky will remember, because he is a member of that committee—an editorial published on the front page of the Hearst papers in which they condemned the House and condemned the Congress for not accepting the general sales tax; and I want to give them credit for being perfectly frank. They said that if we will adopt a general sales tax there will be no need for increasing income taxes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I recall that long before the depression began, and when we were running over one another here to reduce taxes in order to reduce the surplus in the Treasury, there was a very pronounced advocacy on the part of some people in this country of the inauguration of a sales tax, not as a matter of necessity, not as a war tax, not as an emergency tax, not for the purpose of raising money to wipe out a deficit in the Treasury, but as a permanent taxing policy in this country.

It may be that our present unfortunate circumstances have given the occasion when that effort may be and is probably being intensified, though I acquit the Senator from Massachusetts of any such desire, because I know he not only favors the income tax but that he has voted to increase the brackets so as to raise a larger amount.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I proposed in the committee the high brackets which are found in the pending bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. What I said about the purpose of those who originally inaugurated the plan for a sales tax in no way applies to the Senator from Massachusetts. I do recall that our mail has been flooded, and propaganda has come to us for years, I think probably for 8 or 10 years, in behalf of a general sales tax.

In view of this long-extended effort to bring about the sales tax as a permanent taxing policy in the United States, the question I asked the Senator was whether, even if for temporary purposes, or to meet an emergency, it is now adopted, he thinks we shall ever be able to eliminate it?

Mr. COUZENS. It is my opinion that we will not, because we will have the same organization that is now working to put it over maintained for the purpose of keeping it in our taxing system. In other words, their whole argument is based on the fact that it is a painless tax. Any tax that is painless is a bad tax, because the only way the people will keep familiar with and informed on governmental expenditures is by knowing they are being taxed to maintain those expenditures. The subtleness of the thing is the fact that it is called a painless tax.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Can the Senator imagine that the enormous propaganda, the direct lobbying, of almost every character, that has gone on for the sales tax would have been undertaken if it had been contemplated that we would abandon it within two years, as, of course, the bill will provide?

Mr. COUZENS. I have not the slightest idea that that is their intention.

Mr. GEORGE. It seems to me it could not be expected that there was any desire or purpose to abandon it, because since I have been in the Senate I have known of no more intense propaganda than has been brought to bear, at least upon the members of the Finance Committee, for this particular proposal.

Mr. COUZENS. The intensity of the propaganda for the proposal is terrific. Not only that, but the proponents of the tax are taking advantage of the present situation to put it over; and remember, if we ever put the tax over, in two years all the great organs of publicity and all the agencies and attorneys of wealth will be saying, "Why repeal such an unburdensome tax? Why remove a tax which has been collected so easily and has been so painless?"

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The thing that concerns and mystifies me is that Senators who stand here and vote consistently and invariably for high protective tariff duties, many of those duties positively prohibitory, from which the Treasury does not derive one dollar of revenue, are now so concerned about a sales tax, which will produce millions of dollars of revenue; and their objection to it is that the sales tax is a painless tax. That is the very basis of tariff taxation, that people do not know when they are paying the tax.

The average American citizen who is not compelled to pay an income tax, who does not come in personal communication or contact with the internal revenue collectors, does not understand that every time he goes into a grocery store to make a purchase, that every time he makes a purchase of any nature whatsoever, practically, the man behind the counter collects from him, not a tax for the use of the Treasury at Washington, but a tribute to be paid to the manufacturer.

Mr. COUZENS. O Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. Yet Senators who stand here and vote for taxes of that kind object to the sales tax because it is a painless tax, and may not ever be repealed. I want it understood that I am not speaking for a sales tax; I do not know exactly how I shall vote upon the proposition, but I am concerned that these gentlemen who are willing to have us pay tribute to these manufacturers from one year's end to the other are not willing to draw back a small proportion of their privileged profits.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, if the Senator wants to get into a tariff discussion, I should wholly disagree with his statement that every time a purchaser went into a grocery store to purchase anything he paid tribute to the manufacturer. That is not correct, when millions of our citizens are going into the stores of the country to-day and buying eggs at much less than the cost of production on the farm, or buying other farm products at less than the cost of production on the farm, and are paying no tribute to the producers, to the manufacturers, or to anyone else.

Mr. GLASS. Every time a person goes into a store and purchases an article on which a tariff levy prevails, he pays tribute to the manufacturer of that article.

Mr. COUZENS. That may or may not be true. That tribute may be paid to the workers who produce the goods. It may be for the purpose of maintaining a higher standard of living than is maintained by our European or Asiatic competitors.

Mr. GLASS. That is the same old plea, of protecting American labor against the pauper labor of Europe. At the same time we were bringing the pauper labor of Europe over here by the millions. That is what has produced the unemployment in this country, the fact that we have millions of people here who ought to be somewhere else.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, this is not a tariff argument. I did not rise to discuss the tariff. It may have its weak points, but I think the country is committed to the principle, at least, that we are going to maintain as high as possible the standard of living of our workers here.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Virginia speaks of the drawback. There will be no drawback under a sales tax from the manufacturer. The drawback will be from the people themselves, and if we ever get this principle established of a sales tax in this country, I do not care to how few articles it may apply, the working people of this country and the farmers of this country want to get it into their heads that if food is exempted this time, and if clothes are exempted this time, they will not be exempted the next time. This is simply a proposal on the part of the great financial interests of the country and the manufacturing interests of the country themselves, who want to have this tax imposed and pass it on to the poor classes of the people.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, that is undoubtedly true, and I want to say in this connection that all we have to read is the inspired articles. Here is one from the great spokesman of the White House, Mark Sullivan, an article which appeared in the Washington Star last night, wholly misrepresentative of the facts, wholly untruthful as to the facts, and wholly inspired by some source unknown to me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not be diverted from the purpose with which he started out, to point out to us the number of controversial questions in this bill that would likely prolong debate indefinitely.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not intend to be diverted so that I will not touch upon that before I get through if it takes all day; but, of course, I yield to my colleagues if they want to express any view concerning this question.

I rose to point out that if this amendment is presented and seriously taken up, it can not be disposed of in less than a month, and I want to point out that if there is any failure to balance the Budget, if there is any delay, the responsibility will be on the proponents of this amendment, because such a proposal as is contained in this amendment can not be disposed of in less than a month.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator does not question the right of another Senator or a group of American citizens to propose a substitute for the tax plan involved in the bill, does he?

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then why does the Senator say that the mere proposal of it will mean a month's delay?

Mr. COUZENS. Because of the intricacies of the substitute which has been proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Who causes the month's delay, the proponents of the substitute or those who object to it?

Mr. COUZENS. The proponents, because they have not properly analyzed it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Are those who oppose it to be held without blame because they want to discuss it for a month, and are the proponents of the substitute to be blamed because it takes the opponents a month to discuss it?

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly; it is the fault of the proponents that the delay will be caused.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We have the right of petition, we have the right to be heard, we have the right to our day in court. The Senator from Michigan is attempting to claim that another Senator has not any right to propose a tax plan here which he considers better for his country, without threats being made that it will mean months of delay and attempting to shift the responsibility for not balancing the Budget to those who make the new proposal.

Mr. COUZENS. It is the responsibility of those who make the proposal. If the proposal is not brought before the Senate there will be no such delay. Nobody denies the right of petition. I merely want to point out what will happen as the result of the petition. I am not denying the right of the Senator or anybody else to petition.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator was threatening that if we propose this plan it will delay proceedings for a month. That is a threat and nothing else, and I resent it.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not care what the Senator resents. The fact is that I do not make any threats. I am telling what the practical proposition is. The Senator has not given me an opportunity, nor have other Senators, to disclose what is involved in the proposal. I want to say that before the involvements are threshed out and understood by the public a month will have elapsed. If the Senator wants to construe that as a threat, let him so consider it. I do not propose to be a party to having a monstrosity like this put over on the American public without a protest on my part—a monstrosity that will never be gotten out of the taxing system if it is ever made a part of it by legislation.

The Senator from Massachusetts blames me and says I am threatening. I make no threats. It is the Senator, perhaps, because he is introducing an amendment to the bill involving the whole taxing problem of the United States for us to swallow whole without any criticism being offered or any amendments being proposed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Not at all; but it has not taken a month to discuss the whole bill, and the Senator from Michigan is now claiming that it will take a month to discuss one amendment, in the nature of a substitute, substituting a general excise tax for the special excise taxes which are now in the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. The reason why is because the Senate never before had any such monstrosity as this to consider. Every proposal that is now in the revenue bill is one with which the Government and the people of the United States have had experience. I do not know of a single tax that was approved by the Finance Committee or that has been approved by this body with which the Government and its people have not had experience. But the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts involves a taxing principle different from anything with which we have ever had to contend. It is one with which I hope we will never have to contend. It is the greatest monstrosity of a taxing system that I ever heard conceived of.

I want to point out something else. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] asked me not to overlook the reason for which I rose, which was to point out what is involved in the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I thought it was perfectly fair for the opponents of the amendment to advise the proponents of what they will have to contend with in the way of amendments to the amendment, in the way of definitions, and so forth, before the Senate would be willing to accept such a monstrosity.

If the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts carries out the intent, or at least what I believe to be the intent, of the Senator, it would relieve all those who have difficulty in maintaining a decent existence. I have not contended that the Senator from Massachusetts has any other desire. He does, however, point out the great difficulties which would be involved in exempting the people in whom he seems to be so greatly interested. If they should be exempted, there would be no task too great for this body to undertake than to see that they are exempted. It will be my purpose to offer amendments as we go through the Senator's amendment to see that those people are exempted.

I resent the charge of demagoguery every time a public official rises anywhere to defend or protect a less-privileged class of my country. Every time a public official, every time a newspaper, every time a political candidate, even including Governor Roosevelt, of New York, raises a voice in behalf of the 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 of those gainfully employed, seeking their welfare, saying something in their defense, something for their protection, he is charged with being a demagogue. The great ex-Governor of the State of New York rises in defense of the great industries of New York, the great banking industries, and charges Governor Roosevelt with being a demagogue because he raises his voice in defense and in support and in protection of the group of our citizens who need the most consideration.

And yet the amendment now submitted proposes to take hundreds of millions of dollars out of the pockets of the greatest purchasing group of the United States—what for? To relieve other taxpayers. If we are going to take up this proposal seriously, paragraph by paragraph, obviously amendments will have to be made.

I had reached this point when I was diverted. I was about to refer to exemption No. 2, medicines, other than patent or proprietary medicines. I assume that cascarets, cascara, agar-agar, aspirin, veronal, and all those articles which we purchase at the drug stores to prevent pain, to prevent or cure sickness, are to be taxed. What for? For the purpose of saving a tax on some special article which may or may not be needed for our existence.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Nearly all of the articles the Senator has classified and mentioned, including such items as listerine and similar household articles and proprietary medicines, are used by the poor of the country.

Mr. COUZENS. Undoubtedly, because they are not always able to run to a high-priced physician to get a special prescription. No one objects to a tax on the articles which the Senator from Massachusetts mentions, but I submit that a plan to tax the purchasers of expensive draperies, rugs, pictures, jewelry, and so forth, can not be used as a screen to get the 40,000,000 others who would be involved.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the proponents of the sales tax are so much concerned in taxing the rich man's draperies and jewelry, they can reach that rich man by adopting the income-tax increases which we have proposed, can they not?

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly. I am not charging the Senator from Massachusetts with having this motive, but I want to say that the great master mind behind this screen is perhaps not apparent to the public. I say the proponents of the general sales tax have answered the siren call of that group, not intentionally, but nevertheless answered it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. While the Senator is on the subject of proprietary medicines, I would like to refer to one of the reports of the committee on the cost of medicine in the United States. As the Senator probably knows, the chairman of that committee is the Secretary of the Interior, and its membership comprises many of the most prominent physicians in the United States. It is a study which has had the cooperation of the American Medical Association. After very exhaustive researches they report that the annual bill for medicines in the United States is approximately $715,000,000. They state that this is nearly as much as the amount spent annually for physicians or for hospitals; that more than 70 per cent of the total expenditure for drugs and medicines is for self-medication; that is, for patent medicines and home remedies. They state further that physicians are writing fewer prescriptions and that the production and consumption of ready-made package medicines is increasing; that in the great majority of the 60,000 drug stores in the United States pharmacists are called upon to devote only one-half of their time to the practice of pharmacy.

In that connection may I further point out, to supplement what the Senator has already said, that these are not the so-called patent medicines which are "good for man and beast," which will cure an itch on the head and a pain in the back with one dose. More and more it has become the practice of the legitimate manufacturers of drugs and medicines to put up the recognized medicines in patented form for the consumption of the public. To supplement the list given by the Senator just now, the disinfectant S T 37, which is in very common use, would be taxed under the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts. Mercurochrome, used commonly in the household for the prevention of infection in cuts or bruises, and many other similar items would be involved, which I shall not take the time of the Senator to mention. I wanted to point out the enormous bill for medicines which would be taxed under the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts as it now stands.

Mr. COUZENS. Not only is that true, but let me point out that every piece of lumber, every shingle, every bag of cement, every piece of electrical equipment that goes into the workingman's home is to be taxed under the new proposal. When these matters come before the Senate amendments will be offered to exempt them, so that Senators will have an opportunity to declare by their votes whether they want to tax these items or not.

The Senator from Massachusetts has been here long enough to know that these matters can not be disposed of in a few days. It will take weeks to go through all the items involved, so that the Senate will be able to determine whether we want to place this special burden on these particular commodities.

I would propose that all articles used in the building or furnishing and maintenance of the home costing less than $8,000 be exempted. I would have every brick, every bit of lumber, every bathtub, all the things enumerated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] this morning, exempted from this proposal if it is to be seriously considered.

It seems to be assumed that all the young couples who are going to get married or who are just getting married are not going to be permitted to equip a modest home without having to pay this atrocious tax on every purchase they make, not only in the purchase of the home itself but in its furnishings. As we go through the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts, there will be thousands and thousands of amendments offered to exempt various items from being included in the sales tax.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask the Senator what is the difference between the sales tax he is discussing and the tariff tax which he favored so vigorously? Is not the sales tax exactly the same thing as the tariff tax which the Senator is supporting?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I had a colloquy with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] about it this morning, and I do not want again to become involved in a tariff debate now.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not in the Chamber at the time, and I just wanted to know the difference between the tax the Senator is calling a sales tax and a tariff tax.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator, of course, knows that tariff taxes are not all workable; they do not all become effective. The Senator knows that hardly any of the protective tariff duties on agricultural products are effective at this particular time, and he also knows that there are other commodities on which the tariff is not effective because of competitive conditions. For example, take the motor-car industry. There is a tariff on motor cars, but it is not effective, because we sell motor cars in this country for less than they can be sold abroad, so that the tariff is ineffective. In other words, we can go through the list and find cases where the tariff is effective and where it is not effective; but under this amendment, excluding the exceptions made by the Senator from Massachusetts, the tax is applicable to all. I do not, however, want to get into a tariff discussion.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. A more accurate answer to the question of the Senator from Kentucky would be to say that a tariff levy does not necessarily involve the collection of a tax by the Treasury to maintain the Government, whereas the proposal now being discussed would collect hundreds of millions of dollars for the Treasury.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. A tariff tax means tribute for the privileged classes, while a sales tax——

Mr. COUZENS. Who has the floor, Mr. President?

Mr. GLASS. I supposed the Senator had yielded to me. I beg his pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. COUZENS. The point was made, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, that this proposed tax would come out of the manufacturers, and before the Senator from Kentucky came in I was showing that it would not come out of the manufacturers.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, what I was saying to the Senator from Kentucky was that what the Senator from Michigan failed to point out was that the tariff tax eventually means tribute for a privileged class, while a sales tax means money brought into the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BORAH. From whom?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I disagree with the Senator from Virginia, much as I dislike to do so, but the fact is that the tariff tax is not collected in many cases, but wherever it is collected it is to protect American workmen.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Regardless of whether or not the tariff may be wrong or may be right, two wrongs do not make a right. Even if we assume that the cases are parallel, it seems to me perfectly preposterous to say because we have enacted one law that may be wrong that we should go ahead and put further taxes upon the people of this country because the Congress sees fit to put another burden upon them.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. WHEELER. That is just drawing a red herring across the trail, it seems to me, in order to help out the manufacturers and the great income-tax payers of this country who want to shift the burden from their own shoulders and place the tax upon the workers and the farmers of the country.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia seemed to imply that this proposed tax was coming out of the manufacturers who benefit by the tariff law. Assuming that they do benefit, I want to reiterate that the $350,000,000 which the Senator from Massachusetts desires to have collected under a taxing system, which is new in our fiscal scheme, will not come out of the manufacturers but out of the consumers; and a large part of it out of the consuming public who are unable to bear the burden. I do not disagree with the Senator from Virginia in a desire to get from the rich taxes on profits that might come to them from the benefits they enjoy under the tariff when such benefits are unreasonable or excessive. In that respect I agree that we ought to tax them either through income or profits taxes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under the plan proposed the tax of 1¾ per cent is to be paid in the first instance on the sales price by the manufacturer?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is the Senator confident that the manufacturer will in every instance be able to add that tax to his selling price? Will he not be obliged at times to absorb it himself?

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, no one can tell exactly what will happen, but I want to say that if it is absorbed by any group it, of course, will be absorbed by the great and powerful interests and will further tend to centralize capital and control of industry. It will be, perhaps, one of the most decisive steps that we have ever taken to drive out of business the independent stores, the little manufacturer, the small business men all over the country, who will not be able to absorb the tax. So if we should adopt it, and if, as the Senator says, some of the producers may attempt to absorb it, it will be absorbed by those already powerful and rich and, therefore, will tend further to concentrate wealth and industry into great organizations.

Mr. President, paragraph (3) of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts exempts:

> wearing apparel for any part of the body, not including boots or shoes sold for (or, if imported, valued under subsection (c) (1) at) more than $5 a pair, and not including any article sold for (or, if imported, valued under subsection (c) (1) at) more than $35. A suit or dress shall be considered a single article for the purposes of this paragraph.

I wonder how feasible that provision is of administration. In order to escape the tax all one would have to do would be to sell a suit of clothes for $34.99, and the tax would be avoided, whereas if he sold the suit for $35.10 the tax would have to be paid. If one should buy a pair of boots or shoes for $4.99, he would pay no tax, but if he should buy a pair of shoes for $5.10, he would pay a tax. Those are samples of the impracticable and unworkable provisions in the amendment, and obviously it will take hours and hours of the Senate's time properly to interpret and amend them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of what the Senator from Michigan said earlier in the day in reference to the attitude of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, is he willing to yield long enough to have the clerk at the desk read an editorial from to-day's Washington News on the subject?

Mr. COUZENS. I would be very glad to have the editorial read.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the clerk read the editorial which I send to the desk.

Mr. COUZENS. Before the editorial is read I should like to make plain to the Senator from Kentucky and to the other Senators that I did not charge that the statements were true.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that.

Mr. COUZENS. I said very plainly that they were being "whispered around the Senate," and that they were being "whispered by the proponents of the sales tax." A great motor car company president said to me, "I think we have got Roy Howard committed to the sales tax, and if he is committed to the sales tax will you not also 'come across' for the sales tax?" I said, "if everybody else in America comes out for the sales tax, I will not."

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the editorial will make the situation clear as to the Scripps-Howard publications.

Mr. COUZENS. I will be very glad to have the editorial read, and I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News, Saturday, May 28, 1932]

THE SALES TAX

Balance the Federal Budget before the political conventions and before Congress is turned into a campaign free-for-all! That is the demand of the country. All sides agree that prolonged delay in passing the tax bill would be disastrous.

Further delay would injure the national credit. It would retard business. It would hold up the vitally necessary unemployment-relief program. The entire country would suffer.

After long months of study and debate, the Republican-Democratic bipartisan tax bill is on the threshold of final passage. It is through the House. Senator HARRISON, ranking Democrat in charge of the bill, says that it can pass the Senate to-day.

It can go through conference in short order and be sent to the President. The tax bill can become law within a few days.

The Senate can then proceed with the remaining appropriation bills, the economy measure, and the relief legislation, and Congress can adjourn before the June conventions and the campaign.

There is only one threat to this desired speed. That is the attempt to revive the defeated sales tax.

The chance of the sales tax passing both Houses is slight. But the chance of the sales tax last ditchers blocking action for several weeks is very grave.

Senators SMOOT and HARRISON, the Republican and Democratic tax leaders, both say the sales tax can not pass the Senate. But even if the sales tax could pass the Senate, virtually everyone at the Capitol admits that it can not pass the House—which has already defeated it once. Allowing for a political miracle, tactics of delay and obstruction might conceivably get the sales tax through the House.

But that delay of the tax bill, and consequent delay of the whole balance budgeting and relief program, are precisely what the country can not stand.

If it were the other way around, doubtless the country would be willing to swallow a bad sales tax as better than none, as better than disastrous delay. But that is not the situation. It is the reverse.

The only way to get through the relief and economy measures and balance the Budget before the conventions is to pass the bipartisan Republican-Democratic tax bill at once.

Whether the sales-tax principle is good or bad—and we believe it is bad—is an academic question now. The practical issue is speed. Business is waiting for a balanced Budget. The unemployed are waiting for relief.

Congress must act, and act quickly.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, paragraph (5) exempts agricultural implements and articles used in agricultural production. It reads as follows:

(5) Agricultural implements and machinery and parts thereof, and gas and electricity for farm use or for use for irrigation or other agricultural purposes.

So, in effect, in order to collect this tax, every switch box, every power board, will have to be measured to ascertain how much of the power is by activities other than those which are exempt under the provisions of the amendment.

Paragraph (6) provides that workmen's hand tools shall be exempted; so that the equipment of every great industrial plant will be exempted from taxes in so far as such equipment comprises tools which workmen use with their hands. Therefore that provision will have to be made definite.

Then I want to point out the very great tenderness paragraph (9) exhibits for the newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals. Just why great successful newspapers should be exempted from paying any production tax, I am unable to understand, unless it be that they are to be relied upon to put over and to compel the public to swallow this iniquitous tax.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope that we will not seriously have to take up this question for consideration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I realize that the sales tax is not now pending before the Senate, and that the Senator from Utah and other Senators want to get on with the bill, but I do not wish the present discussion of the sales tax to close without emphasizing the realities of the situation.

The House of Representatives had a long and bitter fight over the sales tax, and it was rejected in that body by a substantial majority. The Senator from Arkansas, the leader on the other side, stated this morning that, in so far as his investigations have gone, if I understood him correctly, he is unable to ascertain that there has been any substantial change in sentiment in the other House which would justify the contention by the proponents of the sales tax that the House has reversed its position. It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that it is obvious that those who now in the closing hours of the deliberations of this body on the tax bill bring forward a measure which strikes at the fundamental principle of graduated taxation upon which taxation has been based in the United States since 1913, must assume responsibility for any delay which may be occasioned by the consideration of that proposal.

Had the House of Representatives adopted the sales tax, and were those of us who oppose that vicious method of taxation in the position of endeavoring to strike it out of the bill at this time, it might well be said that the responsibility for delay would rest upon the opponents of the sales tax. To-day the revenue bill is, after weeks of work on the part of the Senate Finance Committee and of the Senate, practically ready to be passed, without any change in the fundamental principle upon which taxation has been based in this country for 20 years.

I wish to emphasize that it is unfair of the proponents of this measure to contend that those of us who are unalterably opposed to it should accept their proposal without offering amendments or debating the fundamental principle involved in it.

As I have said before in the debate upon this bill, I have not been one of those who, either within or without this Chamber, have contributed to creating in the public mind unreasoning fear over balancing the Budget; but the fact exists that responsible officers of the administration, business men, bankers, Members of Congress, and the press, have carried on in the public press and over the radio a propaganda which has had the effect of creating in the public mind a virtual panic concerning the balancing of the Budget. In view of that fact, as a rather recent member of the Finance Committee, I have in the consideration of this bill, voted for some of the taxes that it contains, not because I believe that they are sound in principle, but because I have believed it was necessary to expedite the passage of the bill in view of the fears that have been created in the public mind.

Every Senator here knows that if I had had my way about it, I would have achieved this result by the continuation of the sound principle of taxation embodied in graduated income and estate taxes; that the burden, whether it be light or heavy, shall be distributed in proportion to the ability of the taxpayer to carry that burden. But the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], and the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] were defeated by a majority of this body. I, therefore, faced the realities of the situation; and, knowing that the sales tax—vicious as I believe it to be in principle and unjust as it is to the common people of the United States—would be offered, I said that I would vote for the highest tax rates upon special commodities rather than to have this vicious principle become a part of the fiscal policy of this Republic.

Under special excise taxes there may be some relief for the taxpayer. He can decline to purchase if he believes the tax too high. But under the general sales-tax proposal now put forward, may I say, by a prominent member of the party which pretends to draw its inspiration from Thomas Jefferson, there is no relief. It taxes the unborn; it taxes the individual while he lives; and after he is dead, and before he can be interred in the ground, it continues to place this inequitable and unjust form of taxation upon him.

Ever since the war—in fact, ever since adoption of the constitutional amendment granting to the Federal Government the power to levy graduated income taxes—there has been a bitter fight over every revenue bill to prevent the adoption of rates upon incomes and upon estates which would place a fair and proportionate share of the cost of government upon those best able to bear it. In the debate upon the Couzens amendment I pointed out that when the war was declared and it became necessary to raise enormous sums of money for the purpose of prosecuting the war, those who believed sincerely in the system of graduated taxation sought to extract every dollar of war profits from those who were profiting at the expense of the country's war-time extremity. They were defeated. The Government adopted rates infinitely lower than those imposed even by Great Britain, and chose to raise the largest share of the burden of the war by the issuance of bonds. That policy increased the Federal per capita debt in the United States from $12.50 in 1916 to $150 to-day, even after the repayment of several billions of the debt incurred during the war.

That burden must be paid; and we are fighting here, in opposing the sales tax, not only over the question how revenue shall be raised to achieve an alleged "balanced Budget" in this emergency, but we are fighting to determine whether the cost of the war shall be borne in proportion to ability to pay, or whether we shall put that burden upon those who were called upon to fight this war on foreign soil, 3,000 miles away, and upon their children and their children's children.

Confronted with that issue, I would fight to the last gasp to prevent the writing into law of the insidious policy embodied in the sales tax. I shall therefore claim my right, as a representative in part of the people of a sovereign State of this Union, to debate fully the issues involved in the sales-tax proposal, and, if it is to become a part of the law, to fight for amendments to relieve in so far as possible the low-income group in the United States—the underprivileged, as they are described by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] says this is a plan to tax the rich. If the Senator from Massachusetts really wanted to tax the rich he had his opportunity on two roll calls in connection with this bill—one on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], which would have permitted the elimination of all the special consumption taxes, and the other on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], which would have permitted us to eliminate at least some of them.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. May I also point out that the Senator from Massachusetts had an opportunity to vote to eliminate that group in the low income-tax brackets for which he pleaded so hard in opposition to the taxes proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and myself. As the Senator will remember, the Senator from Louisiana offered an amendment to eliminate that group—the group that was so pleaded for by the Senator from Massachusetts—and the Senator from Massachusetts voted against that amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if in arguing this question we are going to designate these amendments by slogans, if the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is denounced as a plan to "soak the rich," we are justified in saying that the plan of the Senator from Massachusetts is a plan to "soak the poor." Since the Senator from Massachusetts has contended that his amendment would not fall upon those who toil in this country, and would reach the rich, perhaps it would not be amiss to read a letter signed by the president of the American Federation of Labor, who speaks for millions of workers and for millions out of work in the United States to-day.

Under date of May 26 he addressed to me the following letter, which I assume was addressed to all other Senators:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 26, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am taking the liberty of addressing you for the purpose of transmitting to you the attitude of labor toward the revenue measure which is now being considered by you and your associate Members of the United States Senate.

As reasonable-minded people, labor recognizes the necessity of enacting a tax measure at this session of Congress which will provide additional revenue for the Government. Working men and women recognize that the expenses and income of the Government must be balanced as nearly as possible.

Because the burden of taxation must rest very heavily upon labor, those affected are of necessity concerned with the character of tax legislation approved by Congress. Real estate, tobacco, cigar, amusement, and other forms of taxation of that kind are inevitably borne by the masses of the people. While labor may submit uncomplainingly to the payment of this character of taxes, it is irrevocably opposed to the imposition of a sales tax.

Labor is opposed to the sales tax because it is wrong in principle. It tends to impose the burden of taxation upon those least able to pay it and to relieve the more fortunate of taxation burdens which they should rightfully bear. We are convinced that some of those who support Federal sales tax legislation hope eventually to replace this form of taxation for the income-tax plan which is now in effect, and which some of the advocates of the sales tax declare "has degenerated into a racket."

Laboring people have always proceeded upon the assumption that our tax structure has been erected upon the basis of capacity to pay. This would mean that the burden of taxation would be equitably borne by all groups of people. It is inconceivable at this time when millions are dependent because of unemployment and when so many people are forced to economize and forego even the bare necessities of life that the burden of taxation should be laid more heavily upon them through the enactment of a sales tax law. The mere suggestion that foodstuffs and certain lines of clothing would be exempt could not appeal to the conscience and judgment of the masses and would not influence them to support the sales tax law.

People must buy more than food and clothing. To compel them to pay a sales tax upon all purchases made with the exception of food and certain lines of clothing means that workers must buy less and use less.

I am firmly convinced that the social consequences which would follow the enactment of a sales-tax measure would be most disastrous in effect. You must know, as well as all who are in close touch with the unemployment situation, that great social unrest and much economic dissatisfaction prevail. We are doing everything that lies within our power to preserve industrial peace and to minimize social unrest. The enactment of a sales tax would, in my opinion, inflame the minds of distressed workers so that the social unrest which now prevails would be very greatly aggravated.

May I earnestly request that when the sales-tax proposal is presented for definite action that you will keep fresh in mind the opposition of labor and of the masses of the people to its adoption by the Congress of the United States? I earnestly hope that you will share labor's point of view in its opposition to the enactment of a sales tax law.

Very respectfully yours,

WM. GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

The Senator from Massachusetts characterized as a threat the statement by the Senator from Michigan that if this proposal were brought forward the opponents of it would find it necessary to offer innumerable amendments in an endeavor to prevent the heavy hand of the Federal tax gatherer from falling unjustly on the backs of an already overburdened and restless people.

I hold in my hand the Canadian sales tax law. It contains six pages of exemptions. This Canadian law has been held up as a model by the advocates of the sales tax. I shall not take the time to read all of the exemptions at this time, but I wish to point out some of the things which are exempted. Among them are books for the blind; books not printed in Canada; nicotine; nonalcoholic preparations or chemicals for dipping or spraying; nonalcoholic preparations or chemicals such as are used in disinfecting or spraying; fire brick containing not less than 90 per cent of silica; magnesite brick; bells when imported for the use of churches; castings of iron or steel; coil chain; chain links; milking machines and attachments therefor; fruits and vegetables; washing machines; windmills; portable engines with boilers; equipment for generating electric power; machinery and apparatus for use exclusively in washing or drying coal; machinery and apparatus and complete parts used in producing unrefined oil from shale; well-drilling machinery and apparatus; seamless iron or steel tubing; well-drillng machinery and apparatus complete; machinery and appliances of iron or steel; articles for use exclusively in the metallurgy or smelting of iron; machinery and apparatus of a kind or class not made in Canada; ore crushers, rock crushers, stamp mills, and so forth; diamond drills and core drills; coal-cutting machines; sundry articles of metal; pumps and vacuum pumps; amalgam safes; automatic ore samplers; machinery and apparatus and complete parts thereof for the recovery of solid or liquid particles, and so forth; machinery for use in sawing lumber up to but not including the operation of planing; machinery, logging cars, cranes, blocks and tackle, wire rope; cylinder stave saws; shovels; spades; engines and complete parts thereof to be used in the propulsion of boats; articles which enter into the cost of manufacture of goods enumerated in certain tariff items, and so on.

It certainly could not be contended—and I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts would not contend—that if he brings forward a proposal here which many of us feel would change the fundamental character of our tax system, we should not, in the first place, debate fully the fundamental principle involved; and, secondly, threatened as we might be with its enactment into law, that we should be precluded from offering all necessary amendments intended to alleviate the burden of this tax upon the common people.

I had not intended to dwell at all upon the principle involved in the sales tax; but I feel so deeply about it that I was diverted. What I rose to say—and what I wish to say, in conclusion—is that I believe, in view of the legislative situation, as the Senator from Arkansas pointed out this morning, that those who intend to inject the sales-tax argument into the closing hours of the consideration of this bill must accept full responsibility, not only for the delay which will be necessarily and legitimately occasioned in the Senate but also for the delay which may be occasioned if the House of Representatives rejects this tax and it becomes necessary to bring the bill back to the Senate to do over the work which we have already done in the past two weeks.

I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks Schedule III of the Canadian special war revenue act.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

All orders in council providing for the payment of 50 per cent of the rate of consumption or sales tax imposed on certain goods are repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of to-day's business the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be entered.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, for the purpose of having the proposed amendment printed, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts relative to the manufacturers' tax, to come at the end of his amendment. It is what was known as the Connally amendment, with regard to the income-tax schedule. I ask to have it printed and lie on the table, to be proposed by me at the proper time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, in regard to the provision on page 274, I should like to have pending as an amendment to the House text in line 15, page 274, after the word "than," to strike out the word "one-fourth" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "one-eighth," so that the tax on the stock-exchange sales would be one-eighth of 1 per cent instead of one-fourth of 1 per cent, as the House provided. I would like to have that amendment pending.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not rise at this time for the purpose of discussing the merits or demerits of the proposal contained in the amendment known as the emergency manufacturers' excise tax. I fully appreciate that there is much that can be said in opposition to the adoption of this policy as well as any other taxation plan, and I have no quarrel with those who desire to debate the proposition as long as they choose.

The able senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] pointed out to the Senate that there were provisions in the amendment which would be subject to many amendments. He appeared to be armed with a great deal of objections to the various provisions of the proposal. I was disappointed when he finished, for I found that the only criticism he made was of the exemptions. Let me briefly refer to them, because it seems to me his criticisms are very trivial.

His first criticism was of the language which exempts food for human or animal consumption. What language could be broader, what language could be used that would include all food and feeds better than the words "food for human and animal consumption"? The Senator did not go into details in his criticism of that item, however.

The next item he took up was that relating to medicine, and he named certain medicines which were not exempted. I want to say, in reply to that, that if there is one provision in this amendment where the tax will be absorbed, it is in the case of medicines. It is the one provision, in my judgment, in this amendment where the tax will not be passed on because of the competition in medicines, the large number of drug establishments, and the fact that the prices of practically all medicines are fixed.

The Senator pointed out some medicines which are in common use, but he did not tell us the price of the medicines, and he did not tell us what the tax would be. Under my proposal a bottle of medicine costing $1, assuming it is in the class that would be taxed, would pay a tax of only 1¾ cents. Some of the medicines he enumerated retail for 25 cents and less. The tax upon medicines of that kind would be a fraction of a penny.

There are a large number of medicines which contain alcohol in various proportions. Some of those patent medicines are produced by some of the most prosperous business concerns of the country. I have in mind now a medicine called "Pepsin Wine," which is very largely and very extensively used. I inquire, Why should medicines of that character be exempt from the provisions of a general sales tax?

However, it is inconsequential whether the exemption be of all medicines or whether we limit it to medicines other than proprietary medicines. That is a trivial issue, and inconsequential. In fact, only yesterday I spoke to the experts about making that provision include all medicines. I do admit that I was very much impressed with the large number of patent medicines in this country costing very high prices, and in that class of medicines the tax would be absorbed.

What is the next objection he makes to this proposal? The third objection he makes is the exemption of newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals.

One would think from the attitude and from the manner of the distinguished Senator, my friend from Michigan, that he could tear the amendment to shreads; and yet when we get right down to it, he criticizes the exemption of food, he criticizes the fact that I have not excluded all medicines, he criticizes the exemption of books and magazines, and that is all.

Now let us see about books, magazines, and periodicals. First of all, they are in the amendment because they were in the bill as drawn by the Ways and Means Committee. Secondly, the magazine publisher and the book publisher and the newspaper publisher will pay the tax, because he has to pay a tax on his paper and on his ink and on his other supplies. He has practically no exemption. He is exempted simply for the cost, in addition to his ink and paper, of putting the book or magazine together.

Here is the sum total of the objections to a proposal covering 28 or more printed pages—not a proper definition of food, magazines, and newspapers should be exempted, not a broad enough exemption of medicine.

Oh, yes; there was another objection! He objected that I was excluding the electricity used on the farm. The Senator did not object to that, but he was not able to see how that could be worked out administratively.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator mean to say that is all the objection I made to his proposal?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator state any further objection he made—I mean to the specific sections of the proposal? Of course, the Senator is opposed to the general principle of a manufacturers' excise tax.

Mr. COUZENS. I pointed out very clearly, as I thought, that there were no exemptions for the home of the man which is to cost less than $8,000, for the furnishings or the equipment, for the bathtub, or anything of that kind in such a home.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator did point out that the exemptions do not include the cost of homes to be built in the future, the cost of materials to be used in homes and office buildings and mansions to be built in the future. The Senator also pointed out that it did not exclude household furniture, the bedding and linens used in homes, and, I think, during the colloquy I had with him I explained the difficulties in trying to reach an exclusion of those particular articles.

As I said, I shall at another stage of the proceedings give what seem to me to be reasons in favor of the tax and discuss the objections which have been made. But I want to say, and I shall say it again and again, that I can not understand how any Senator can defend levying taxes upon particular commodities and articles which must be borne by certain industries, by all the people who purchase articles from those manufacturing industries which will bear a tax of from 2 to 15 or more per cent, and object to a proposal to include all articles except the mere necessities of life and make the rate of taxation 1¾ per cent.

I can not understand the reasoning and logic of one who is willing to accept a heavy, high tax upon certain industries and the products of ceratn industries levied in the way that they are to be levied under my proposal, and yet refuse to put all industries on an equitable basis, namely, to make the rate the same for every industry and to exempt all the necessities of life. It is a proposal to make the lavish spender pay more taxes than those who of necessity must spend frugally.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. What I can not understand is why Senators should be so solicitous about the washbasin that is to go into a house that will cost $8,000 and yet stand here and vote to put a tax on the lumber out of which the house is to be built.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; not only to tax lumber, but to tax it at a rate which is 33⅓ per cent on the cheap lumber that goes into the home of the workingman and only 2 per cent upon the mahogany lumber that goes into the mansion.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. While the Senator is talking about the tariff on lumber, may I make this inquiry in order to understand the scope of the amendment: Does the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts include any of the very contentious tariff rates which are now contained in the bill?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My amendment does not. It excludes any consideration of any tariff item.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Neither oil nor copper nor lumber nor coal?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true. They are all excluded.

Mr. President, reference has been made to my vote on proposals for increasing the rates of income taxes. I supported the committee in that matter. I have supported the committee in every feature of the bill except that I have taken the position that we should substitute a general excise tax for a special limited excise tax. That is the only difference between the committee and myself.

I want to say further to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] that I differ with him and he differs with me in this particular. I agreed with him that when the country was prosperous and corporations were making large profits and incomes were large, in increasing surtaxes and normal taxes. I did not accept the proposal of the Secretary of the Treasury that the increasing of the surtaxes upon wealth would tend to drive money out of business and would result in less capital flowing into private business. I have refused to accept that principle until now.

With business depressed, with profits gone, with incomes wiped out, I believe there is no inducement—and that is one of the troubles with the country—for the man and woman of wealth to put their money into business. An entirely different situation exists now from former years. They are putting their money to-day into tax-exempt securities. I will go farther. If they want to preserve their money and be sure it is safe, they have got to do that. What we are doing when we propose these high surtaxes is further to push the capital out of business enterprises and into tax-exempt securities.

In the prosperous days there was an opportunity, an invitation, to invest and speculate in business enterprises, to make big profits by putting money in business. But what man to-day with $100,000 or $10,000 of income intends or proposes to put it in any business with conditions the way they are in this country? The banks even will not do it on business securities. That seems to me to be one of the problems we have to bear in mind, that we must so shape this tax bill and so shape legislation as to give confidence and hope to the man with money that he can invest his money in private business and open up the avenues of employment for our people.

I make a clear distinction between conditions when the country is prosperous and conditions when the country is prostrate. I say that the whole tendency and the chief inducement to-day for the man or the woman of small means or limited means or wealth, if one wants to be sure that his money is safe, is to go into tax-exempt securities, and they are doing it. Business is suffering. Unemployment is increasing. Money is not flowing into the avenues of business. I do not intend, under these conditions, to pursue a course that will discourage and dishearten business. I want to help private business to recover and thus help relieve unemployment.

One of the advantages of the proposal made by me is that such people—the tax-exempt investors—will be taxed. No other proposal in the bill or any other bill will reach the people by the tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands in this country who have enormous incomes without paying a cent of taxation. But they spend money, and they spend it lavishly, and if they spend money this plan of mine will tax them, and the more they spend the more revenue will flow into the Public Treasury.

Mr. President, I do not care to prolong the discussion any further at this time, but at a later time I hope to have an opportunity to discuss in detail the principles involved in my proposal.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] referred to the absence of any amendment to the pending bill tending to curb the escape of those who seek to evade income taxes through tax-exempt securities. I send to the desk a proposed amendment to the pending bill dealing moderately with that subject, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I also take occasion to ask that there be placed in the RECORD at this point portions of certain editorials appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Washington Daily News, and the New Republic having to do with the sales-tax proposal while under discussion in March and April of this year in the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The editorials are as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 7, 1932]

AN UNDEMOCRATIC TAX BILL

The sales tax, which is depended upon to contribute $595,000,000 of the estimated $1,100,000,000 by which Federal revenues are to be increased by the new tax bill, is far from popular.

The basic flaw in the scheme is the failure of the bill thoroughly to explore the upper brackets of the income tax for funds before a general sales tax, which will increase the cost of living, is imposed upon the country. If we are going to have a sales tax, then it should by all means be balanced by greatly increased surtaxes. During the World War the surtaxes went as high as 60 per cent. We are at war now with a vastly greater foe and one much nearer home. Yet Congress is still proposing to stop surtaxes at 40 per cent. Its excuse is that higher taxes will encounter diminishing returns.

Nevertheless, since the range of the income tax is to be lowered to include many persons of small means heretofore exempt, it should be raised in proportion as a matter of principle. Common decency will be revolted by the spectacle of a tax bill that hits the poor man with a sales tax and higher income taxes, while letting the rich man off with a mild increase represented by a top surtax of only 40 per cent. We should at least make the people in the upper brackets say they have not got the money before we attempt to collect taxes from the people we know have not got it. Congress would be in a much happier position if it went as high as 80 per cent upon all incomes over $10,000,000. Increasing the estate tax to 40 per cent, and placing a 30 per cent tax upon gifts in excess of $100,000, are much fairer provisions than the income-tax schedule.

In his article on The Country's Plight—What Can Be Done About It, Charles G. Ross said in the Post-Dispatch of November 29, 1931:

"The various tax proposals coming before Congress may be grouped under two heads. On the one side are those which would broaden the tax base and on the other are those which would use the taxing power for the double purpose of raising revenue and breaking up, to some degree, the vast accumulations of wealth revealed by the income-tax statistics. The drive is already under way for a general sales tax or a 'selective' sales tax. A sales tax is the income tax in reverse. It is large or small, according to the amount consumed by the taxpayer; the income tax, called by economists one of the fairest taxes ever devised, is large or small according to capacity to pay. A sales tax bears inequitably upon persons of small means; as Prof. E. R. A. Seligman, of Columbia University, has testified, it 'sins against the cardinal principle of equality in taxation.' The fight for or against a sales tax brings into head-on collision the opposing theories of government which have been mentioned. The tax is advocated at this time, manifestly, in an effort to avert higher levies on the rich."

Some notion of how a sales tax of 2.25 per cent on manufactured products will be received may be gained from what is happening in some of the States. Down in Kentucky a protest against a sales tax took the form last week of a mob invasion of the governor's mansion. It is unfortunate that Government economies can not ameliorate the condition more than seems possible. The Government Budget is overloaded with waste. Millions could be saved by limiting veterans without dependents to $25 a month each while they are in Federal institutions, soldiers' homes, or veterans' hospitals. The appropriations for both the Army and the Navy are too large; but with a scant hope of any great achievement at Geneva and with the war in China, it is unlikely that either can be pared. There would, however, be virtue in the proposed consolidation of the Army and Navy under a single head. The feeling about these service funds is very strong in Congress.

* * * * * * *

However, it is the cost of war, past, present, and to come, that takes most of the Government's revenues. Mr. Hoover places the share of Mars as high as 70 per cent of every dollar that the Government receives. The veterans of the last three wars take more than a billion dollars a year out of the Treasury. War has become a much greater economic factor all over the world than is generally recognized.

The bill does not tax food, * * * but it is still a renunciation of everything for which the Democratic Party * * * is supposed to stand.

[From the New Republic, March 16, 1932]

The Democratic-Republican tax bill is a disguised attempt to saddle the Government deficit as little as possible on the rich and as much as possible on the poor. By placing a so-called "manufacturers' tax" of 2¼ per cent on every article produced except foods, books, magazines, and religious goods, it will levy at least 2¼ per cent on a large part of every consumer's income. The man who makes $500 or $1,000 a year will have to pay this tax as well as the man who makes $100,000. How outrageous this is may be realize when we remember that even those in the lowest brackets subject to income tax will be charged, in that tax, only 2 per cent on their net incomes. If the bill had honestly gone about its purpose, it would have abolished all exemptions to the income tax and would have charged everyone a minimum of 2¼ per cent on his earnings, allowing, say, a 40 per cent deduction for food expenses to those with net incomes below $2,000. But, of course, no Congress could do this and still represent itself as interested in the welfare of those who are too poor to get along as it is. So the levy is disguised. A real "manufacturers' tax" would have raised the rate on corporate profits from 12 per cent, not to 13 per cent as in this bill, but to 15 or 20 per cent. This tax, not being paid by those companies which make no profit, could not so readily be passed along.

[From the Washington Daily News, March 19, 1932]

THE TAX VICTORY

In one of the most dramatic and unexpected political revolts in years the House of Representatives yesterday overthrew the combined Democratic and Republican machines in a fight on the tax bill. The rank and file Representatives raised the normal income-tax rate from 6 to 7 per cent on all incomes over $8,000, and jumped the maximum surtax rate from the proposeed 40 per cent and the present 20 to the war-time figure of 65 per cent. The vote was 153 to 87—almost 2 to 1.

Party lines were broken. The administration and the Garner-Rainey-Crisp Democratic dictatorship, using all their power in a reactionary defense, were unable to prevent higher taxation of the middle and wealthy classes. This bill puts a sales tax on the poor man's shoes, clothing, and necessities, but touches only lightly the upper bracket incomes. Yesterday's vote corrects the income-tax injustice. The direct fight on the general sales tax is ahead.

But opponents of the general sales tax, which would hurt consumers through higher prices and hurt business by slowing down sales, have won half their battle. For the Democratic-Republican machine leaders, in trying to put over the general sales tax, have admitted its injustice but argued it was a necessary evil. They claimed there was no other way to cover the $600,000,000 remaining Federal deficit. Now, by increasing the income and surtax rates, the House has provided an estimated $250,000,000 or more.

That leaves about $350,000,000 of deficit uncovered. But the House by applying to estate taxes the same just principle it applied yesterday to incomes can provide double the amount needed—though receipt of the cash would be delayed a year. The Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, which is the official counselor of Congress on revenue, reports that taxation of estates—after allowing a $50,000 exemption—at the same rates as incomes under the pending bill would produce an additional $714,000,000.

The Republican-Democratic machine is not willing to put such a burden on large estates. But the House rank and file, who have just insisted on taxing large earned fortunes, should be able to see the unfairness of allowing large unearned fortunes to escape a commensurate part of the tax burden in this national emergency.

If the House is determined to protect great fortunes at the expense of the consumers and the business men dependent upon trade revival, it at least can restrict its sales tax to luxuries and semiluxuries.

WHAT EXPERTS SAY

It might be assumed that the leaders of the House of Representatives acted upon expert advice when they wrote their vicious general sales tax bill. Search of the record fails, however, to reveal the opinion of one outstanding fiscal expert inside or outside of Government circles who was whole-heartedly for this basic change in the American tax system. If there are any such experts their number is small.

No later than December 14, Ogden Mills, then Under Secretary, and now Secretary of the Treasury, said that the Treasury Department had rejected the general or turnover tax "not only because it bears no relation to ability to pay and is regressive in character, but because of the enormous administrative difficulties and the almost inevitable pyramiding of the tax in the course of successive sales."

Again on March 1[illegible] Mills said: "I happen to be one who in the past has not favored a sales tax. I prefer a tax system consisting of a progressive tax on individual incomes with a broad base, a corporation income tax, an estate tax, customs duties, and a selective group of excise taxes." Now he merely says the Ways and Means sales-tax plan is "acceptable."

Under Secretary of the Treasury A. A. Ballantine is quoted as having denounced the general sales tax as "essentially unjust" and "grossly discriminatory."

E. C. Alvord, Treasury specialist, was asked in committee hearings by Representative CRISP whether as an American citizen he favored the general sales tax. He replied: "At the present time, no, sir."

Dr. Thomas S. Adams, of Yale, a committee witness, thought the system in Canada a success, but admitted he had not talked with Canadian farmer, labor, or consumer groups.

Economists have been almost unanimous in opposing indirect taxes upon the people's needs. For instance—

Adam Smith in his Wealth of Nations: "Tax on the necessities of life operates exactly in the same manner as a tax on the wages of labor."

John Stuart Mill: "Exclusion must be made upon all taxes on commodities, necessities of life, or on materials or instruments employed in producing these necessities. Such taxes are always liable to encroach on what should be left untaxed—the income barely sufficient for healthful existence."

Prof. E. R. A. Seligman, of Columbia: The sales tax "sins against the cardinal principle of equality of taxation."

Dr. William J. Schultz, financial economist for the National Industrial Conference Board: "The supreme drawback to a Federal sales tax would be its social injustice."

Dr. John R. Commons, president of the Consumers League and Wisconsin University economist: "A sales tax reduces the purchasing power and welfare of the millions of low-paid consumers. It is a tax exactly reverse to the better principle of ability to pay."

Dr. John Dewey, of Columbia: "A sales tax is governmental blackmail on hunger and small earned incomes."

The National Industrial Conference Board report of 1929; United States Chamber of Commerce committee on Federal taxation; organizations representing upward of 50,000,000 farmers, union workers, consumers, and retail men, all oppose the sales-tax principle.

Even former Secretary of the Treasury Mellon did not propose a sales tax. When approached upon it last September, Senator REED, after an hour of argument with him, admitted that Mellon "was not so keen for it."

THE SENATE AND FEDERAL TAXES

It is encouraging to learn that the Senate, while favorable in the main to the Federal tax bill passed by the House, is disposed to correct its inequalities.

The House did very well until the powerful influences which usually control it began to make themselves felt. As a result the House completely reversed itself in the matter of surtaxes in the upper brackets. First adopting the Swing resolution carrying these rates up to 65 per cent, it at last weakened and returned to the Treasury's 40 per cent top.

Since higher surtaxes could not hurt anyone unable to pay them, it is fair to assume that it was the fear of dwindling campaign contributions that at last drove the House from its position.

Thus did the system which Professor Taussig says rules the country reassert its power to escape its proportionate share of the tax burden. It may be debatable whether the great incomes are capable of producing more revenue than the Treasury says they can produce; but the numerous excises which have been voted could have been imposed with much better grace had the House first demonstrated its willingness to tap the great fortunes which favorable governmental policies have permitted their possessors to acquire.

On the whole, however, the common man has gained more by the bill than he has lost. It is infinitely to be preferred to the program which was originally advanced by the Treasury. The administration proposed, for instance, to obtain only 9 per cent of the amount necessary to balance the Budget by reducing expenditures; 8 per cent from the taxation of corporations; 14 per cent through taxes which would fall primarily on wealth; and the great majority, 69 per cent, by taxing general trade.

The final House bill, by contrast, proposes to raise 16 per cent of the required funds by cutting appropriations; 13 per cent by taxing corporations; 30 per cent by taxing wealth through higher income and estate taxes, gift taxes, luxury taxes on jewels, furs, yachts, and the like, the reduction of capital-loss deductions, and the taxation of dividends; and only 41 per cent by lowering income-tax exemptions, raising postal rates, and imposing excises on admissions, cosmetics, soft drinks, candy, telephone and telegraph messages, automobiles, radios, and other articles of common consumption which fall most heavily on the masses.

The bill, moreover, is vastly superior to the measure which the Democratic-Republican coalition in the Ways and Means Committee attempted to wish upon the country. The general sales tax has been killed by a decisive vote of 235 to 160. The selective levies which have been imposed in its stead will not be greeted by the public with enthusiasm. But that is precisely why they are to be preferred. These nuisance taxes will unquestionably be repealed as soon as the fiscal emergency has passed.

Their unpopularity is a guaranty of their temporary character. The great threat of the general sales tax was that it would become so hidden in the price structure that it would arouse no serious complaint. The ultimate destruction of income and inheritance taxation and the substitution of extended sales levies would have become only a matter of time. The general sales tax was an entering wedge for the eventual abolition of progressive taxation. Its defeat should be cause for general rejoicing.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] was rejected. That amendment would have limited the check tax to bank checks of over $5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the votes which were taken on the following amendments:

Amendment relating to second-class postal rates, on page 310, line 17;

Amendment relating to tax on matches, on page 253, line 7;

Amendment relating to abatement of excise taxes, on page 248, line 13; and Amendment relating to effective date of Title IV, on page 264, line 14.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motions to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senate should understand and the country should understand that the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is not a general sales tax plan. If it were, I would not support it. It is limited in its application. It has certain exclusions which have been described.

But the matter that I desire to present particularly to the attention of the Senate is this: I have been informed, and have relied upon the information, that when the Senator from Massachusetts introduces his amendment or substitute, an amendment will be offered carrying with it what we may call the Connally income-tax rates; that the two will go together; that we will have an opportunity to vote to raise the income taxes to the amount of approximately $100,000,000 a year; and that the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts will provide an income of $345,000,000 a year, the total increase in revenue coming partly from incomes and partly from the manufacturers' sales tax. Such an increase in revenue will certainly balance the Budget. To-day no one knows whether the measure before the Senate will do that or not. On yesterday a change of one vote on the tax on checks would have made a difference of $95,000,000 in the revenue-raising program of the committee. A motion has just been made to reconsider that vote, and one additional vote will strike from the committee's program $95,000,000.

It has been stated here that there will be long delay because the House will not accept the manufacturers' license tax plan. Let us remember, Mr. President, that the Speaker of the House, the minority leaders in the House, and the majority leaders in the House, all supported in substance this plan. When the House voted it was not confronted with an option. Since that time Members there understand the situation.

It has been stated here to-day, with some vehemence, that the House would not change its position. I think I can say, Mr. President, with equal certainty that the House will change its position; that there will not be unreasonable delay, and the country should know that, in accepting the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts, there is coupled with it the income-tax rates suggested by the Senator from Texas.

Men may predict what the other House will do, but each of us has an equal right to make his own predictions, and it is my opinion that if the Senate shall adopt this compromise, embodying the manufacturers' license tax amendment and the income tax provisions of the so-called CONNALLY amendment, that action will be supported by the House, because I know it will be in response to an almost unanimous national and universal sentiment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, unless the suggestion shall interfere with some other plan the chairman of the committee has in mind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield for that purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Cutting	Kean	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dale	Kendrick	Shortridge
Barbour	Davis	Keyes	Smith
Barkley	Dickinson	King	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to the House text.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered proposes to amend the House text by changing one-fourth of 1 per cent to one-eighth of 1 per cent, so that the tax on stock sales will be exactly the same as the fee the broker receives on such sales. I think that is a very small tax; in fact, it is so small that I can not see why anybody should object to it.

I hope that the amendment may be adopted; and if it shall be adopted, then I shall ask that the Senate committee amendment, beginning on page 274, line 14, be disagreed to and also the amendment on page 273 which relates to the imposition of this tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator what about the committee amendment?

Mr. DILL. The committee amendment, as I have said, should be disagreed to if my amendment shall be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the object I had in voting to strike out the provision in the House text at this point was because I think a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent is too heavy a tax on the shares of mining companies, particularly of the West, many of which sell for 4 cents and 5 cents, and most of which sell for a price under a dollar.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Striking out this provision will not remedy that; the 4 cents a share tax is still in the bill. That must be remedied by another amendment. The remedy for the situation of which the Senator complains is not by striking out the provision of the House text beginning in line 14 on page 274, but by amending the provision imposing a tax on future sales. That is the provision which I think the Senator has in mind. The only way to protect the low-priced mining shares of the western section of the country is simply to provide that no transfer tax shall exceed one-eighth of the selling price, and I intend to offer such an amendment as I have indicated, whether my amendment now pending shall be agreed to or not, because I want to protect such low-priced shares.

However, the amendment now pending changing one-fourth of 1 per cent to one-eighth of 1 per cent provides a tax of exactly the same amount as the brokerage fee which everyone pays if he buys stock on the stock exchange. I do not understand under what theory the Senate will levy a tax upon business of this country and not levy a tax on stock sales equal to the amount of the brokerage fee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to, and I should like to have the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. DILL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the Senator's amendment will reach this matter, but surely there is no reason why we could not put a tax upon the sales made upon the stock market. Of course, we would not be able to reach a transfer of stock where the stock certificate was signed in blank and was passed on from one individual to another. We might not be able to reach that, but surely we can reach every transaction that is made upon any stock exchange in the United States by putting a tax on it. It seems to me there can not be any question about that; and we can put on the same identical tax that the stockbrokers charge as a commission at the present time.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senate committee amendment reduces the revenue below the House proposal $68,000,000. I think that is correct.

I do not intend to debate this matter, but I do want to call to the attention of the Senate the information that has been brought to Congress by Congressman LAGUARDIA, of New York. That is found—if any Senator or anybody else desires to read it—in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 21, 1932, beginning on page 10864, wherein Congressman LAGUARDIA discloses that Mr. Whitney, the president of the New York Stock Exchange, falsely, no doubt deliberately, misrepresented this proposition before the Finance Committee of the Senate.

I desire to read just this one paragraph from Mr. LAGUARDIA's remarks before the House:

> Now, gentlemen, I submit that the tax in England is five times what we propose on a $200 sale, and proportionately larger on other stock transfers. Responsible officials of the New York Stock Exchange appeared before the committee and only disclosed one of the three taxes applicable to the transaction on the London Stock Exchange. It is not only startling and shocking, but it is something which should not remain uncensured.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is my recollection correct that Congressman LAGUARDIA, in the same connection, caused to be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a stock-transfer tax table supporting his statements?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes. The table, which appears on page 10865, shows, for instance, that on stocks selling at $100 per share the British tax is $1, while the Finance Committee's proposal is only 4 cents. I am using that by way of illustration; but the table makes a comparison between the British tax and the Finance Committee's proposal.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. When the Senator spoke about Mr. Whitney's testimony, did he quote Congressman LAGUARDIA as saying that Mr. Whitney deliberately and falsely stated something?

Mr. BLAINE. I think Congressman LAGUARDIA presents very clearly that President Whitney did misrepresent the British tax when he discussed the question before the Finance Committee.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to say that Mr. Whitney might have been mistaken, but I could not conceive that Mr. Whitney—who is a man of known honor and integrity—would deliberately and falsely state anything, because my opinion of Mr. Whitney, which is shared by thousands of citizens of my State, is that under no circumstances would he deliberately and falsely state anything.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am making no charge against President Whitney, but let me call attention to one or two facts which show the deliberation with which Mr. Whitney represented the British tax before the Finance Committee.

I will read that part of Mr. LAGUARDIA's remarks:

> The president of the New York Stock Exchange, Mr. Whitney, appeared before the Finance Committee, and in reply to a question as to the stock-transfer tax in England stated that he had the information, that he would supply the Senate committee with the information; and on April 18, 1932, he furnished the information—which will be found on page 1231 of the Senate hearings—sent it with a covering letter of that date, prepared a comparative statement of the tax in Canada and the proposed tax in the United States and the English tax.

That is, he went to his office and he must have done this under deliberation. It was not in the heat of excitement in testimony before the committee; but he prepared it in the form of a table and covered that with a letter to the committee.

Further quoting from Mr. LAGUARDIA:

> When he gave the English tax he submitted only what is known as the contract-note stamp tax, which is only 1 cent on stock transactions of $75 to $150, while the proposed House tax, coupled with the New York State tax, would be 41½ cents—

I am quoting from Mr. LAGUARDIA—

> By so doing he deliberately misrepresented the English tax, because he must have known, and his experts must have known—as they deal on the London exchange—that there were two additional taxes which were maliciously and willfully omitted from the table submitted by Mr. Whitney, the president of the New York Stock Exchange, to the Finance Committee of the Senate. He thereby led the Senate committee to believe that there was no stock-transfer tax and that the only tax was what is known as the contract-note stamp tax.

Then Mr. LAGUARDIA further shows that he took up the matter with the State Department. The State Department referred the matter to Ambassador Mellon. Mr. Mellon sent a cablegram, and also there was a cablegram—as I recall, it was a cablegram—from the American commercial attaché of the London embassy, both of which communications clearly show that Mr. Whitney had misrepresented the British tax before the Finance Committee.

I am not going to discuss the matter further; but I think Mr. LAGUARDIA has well established his charge.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I hold no brief for the New York Stock Exchange, nor for the New York superbanker. If ever anybody has spoken in set terms regarding them, I have. I can well understand, however, how in the maze of figures which were presented and considered by the Finance Committee, or by the Committee on Banking and Currency—because I sat there myself for two or three days as an interested spectator——

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, let me correct the Senator. This information which was prepared by Mr. Whitney was prepared at the request of the Finance Committee; and he sent that information in table form to the Finance Committee, covering the communication with a letter.

Mr. COPELAND. All right. Now, let me say further that Mr. Whitney might have been mistaken, and sadly mistaken; that the figures might have been muddled; but I do not believe that Mr. Whitney would willfully of malaciously mislead anybody. I think that if there are figures there which can be shown to be mistaken ones—and I am not qualified to speak—it was an honest mistake; and I resent any statement regarding Mr. Whitney that he would maliciously, willfully, falsely, or deliberately seek to deceive anyone.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, let us assume that he did not do it willfully or maliciously. He did give this information, however. There is not any question about that. It is not my purpose to attempt to convict Mr. Whitney. I call the attention of the Senate to this matter to point out that if the House text is defeated the Treasury loses $68,000,000, as I figure it. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is adopted, the Treasury will receive $34,000,000 more than the Treasury would receive under the Senate committee amendment; and I understand that it was understood by many of the members of the Finance Committee that the proposal in the House bill was far in excess of the tax upon like transactions in Great Britain. I merely wanted to point out those facts.

Mr. COSTIGAN. To complete the information of the Senate, may I say to the able Senator from Wisconsin that the cablegrams about the British stock-transfer tax received from Secretary Mellon and the commercial attaché of the London Embassy are set out on page 10865 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes. The evidence is set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator desire a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment?

Mr. DILL. I do not particularly care, Mr. President. I think it might not be fair to some of the Senators to take the vote at this time. This is a rather important item, and they might feel that they wanted to vote on it; and since it has been reconsidered once, there would be no chance to reconsider it again. I think it might be well to let the vote go over until Monday, if the Senator is willing.

Mr. SMOOT. I am sure one or two Senators who were called away from the Senate desire to speak on the subject. Therefore I should not like to have a vote upon the amendment at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to suggest to the Senator that on Monday I hope to be able to propose a unanimous-consent agreement that the Senate, prior to discussing the sales tax and all the amendments to it, shall have a vote directly on the question of whether we are for or against a sales tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the discussion?

Mr. CONNALLY. Before the offering of all these hundreds of amendments that probably will be offered to the sales-tax amendment.

It does seem to me that the President, or whoever is responsible for this propaganda in behalf of the sales tax, ought to know right now that the injection of the sales tax is going to entail endless delay in the favorite pastime now of "balancing the Budget," about which we hear so much. The Senate Committee on Finance and the Senate have been working diligently, and, I think efficiently, in handling this tax bill. We are now practically through the tax bill; and it is a most unfortunate situation to have the proponents of the sales tax rush in here now and kick over the apple cart under the leadership of the White House.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator ought to say that it is under the leadership of the White House. I hope the Senator will at least withdraw that statement until we actually know that it is so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not want to discuss this matter at length, Mr. President, but I shall refer the Senator to my authority. I just wanted to give notice that I desire to get a vote on the sales tax on Monday.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the unanimous-consent proposal?

Mr. CONNALLY. I propose to ask on Monday for a unanimous-consent agreement that we vote straight out as to whether we are going to have a sales tax or not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. After limited debate?

Mr. CONNALLY. Without going into the endless debate over the amendment, and what we are going to take out. Will the Senator from Massachusetts agree to that?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I certainly will. I will agree to anything that will expedite business.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make the proposal now, then.

Mr. SMOOT. Will not the Senator leave that until Monday? There are so many Senators away this afternoon that I hardly think it would be fair.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the understanding is that it is to come to a vote, and there is to be limited debate, I will agree to it.

Mr. GLASS. There may be some of us away Monday who would like to vote now.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let us get the agreement. We want speed. I know the Senator from Utah wants speed, and I am trying to help him, and I hope he will not object.

Mr. SMOOT. I appreciate the Senator's cooperation.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, after two hours' debate, the Senate take a vote on whether or not we shall have a sales tax——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; take a vote on my amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator is going to insist on a vote on his amendment, that will mean that there will be hundreds of amendments offered prior to the vote.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator is asking me to do what I could have proposed in the case of his amendment, not to have a vote on his amendment to put a tariff item in this bill. Of course, the Senator does not mean to do that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not trying to cut the Senator off, but my proposal was that we vote straight out on whether we shall have a sales tax or not. If we have it, then the Senator's amendment will be proceeded with and we will debate it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then the Senator is asking unanimous consent that we consider something that does not exist.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the Senator was in agreement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am in agreement upon voting on my amendment, which proposes a manufacturers' excise tax and limiting the time for debate on it. I am not in agreement with something that is intangible.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, if the Senator would couple with his unanimous-consent request a request that in case the Senate voted for the Senator's amendment, and a motion was made to reconsider, as, of course, it could be reconsidered, it should not be subject to a motion to lay on the table, so that the debate might then continue. If that were done, then we would have a chance to go back and amend the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I make this inquiry of the Senator from Texas? If there is a majority in this Chamber that does not want the sales tax, when I offer my amendment a motion can be made to table it; and if there is a majority, the roll can be called and the debate ended. That is fair enough.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I know of several Senators in the Chamber who very reluctantly vote for motions to lay important matters on the table and cut off debate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I was answering the Senator's proposal. He wants a vote on Monday on this matter.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, my proposal was that the Senate simply enter into a unanimous-consent agreement that we vote yes or no as to whether we shall have a sales tax. Then, if we decide to have a sales tax, we may take up the Senator's amendment and debate it and amend it.

Mr. COUZENS. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. CONNALLY. There is no sense in the Senate spending a week or two weeks' time debating a sales tax which the Senate is not going to adopt.

The Senator from Utah made some complaint to the effect that I suggested something about this drive under the leadership of the White House to turn over the apple cart which he has conducted so well along the highway toward a balanced Budget. I do not make that charge; but here is an Associated Press dispatch carrying a statement with reference to the gathering of newspaper publishers at the White House a few nights ago, in which it is stated:

> The sales levy was discussed from several angles, it was explained, including the possibility of using it as a possible lever for breaking the legislative jam of Budget-balancing measures on Capitol Hill.

Mr. SMOOT. All I had reference to was the statement the Senator made in relation to the White House forcing this question at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator that I firmly believe, from the evidence that has been presented, not only in the press but by the attitude of leading supposed White House spokesmen, that the White House is secretly and covertly urging the sales tax, while it has not the courage to come out in the open and say so.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am taking the responsibility.

Mr. SMOOT. All I can say is that I have never mentioned sales tax to the President, nor has the President to me. So I do not know how the President stands on it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I accept the Senator's statement; but the President knows he does not have to speak to the Senator about that matter, because the Senator wants to get this bill through.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I want.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the President knows anything, he ought to know if he does not know, if he is in conference with any of his leaders on the Senate floor, that the injection of the sales tax at this time is going to entail a lot of delay, and that Budget balancing will not take place soon.

The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] suggested this morning that he was at the White House, and that the President did not discuss with him the sales tax. Yet the Senator from Ohio believes that the President wants the sales tax, because he said so.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield. I never refer to a Senator without according him the courtesy of an opportunity for immediate reply.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, it is somewhat difficult for me to understand just what the Senator has in mind. When the newspapermen asked me about the sales tax and spoke to me about the President, wanting to know what the President's view was, I stated that it had not been discussed.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct; I so stated.

Mr. FESS. And then I gave it as my opinion that, in the choice between the sales tax and the high excise taxes, the President would favor the sales tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I said. I shall make it clear if I did not.

Mr. FESS. I want it understood that I am not giving any information which came to me from the President, for none came to me on that question; I stated only my opinion.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Ohio that he must not have been paying close attention to the Senator from Texas—which, of course, the Senator from Texas deeply regrets—for the Senator from Texas said that the Senator from Ohio had been to the White House, and that the President had not said anything to the Senator from Ohio about the sales tax, and yet the Senator from Ohio said that it was his opinion that the White House preferred the sales tax to the excise tax.

Mr. FESS. Let it be understood that the opinion is not made up from anything that was said to me by the President.

Mr. CONNALLY. I tried to make that clear, because I quoted the Senator while I was looking directly at him, so that he would have an opportunity to correct me if I were wrong.

Mr. FESS. I do not think the Senator is wrong in that statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. Now, I want to answer the Senator from Utah. The Senator from Utah took issue with me because I said that the sales tax was being injected here under what I thought to be the leadership, or the suggestion, at least, of the White House. He says I am doing the White House a great injustice.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I said that as far as I know, the Senator is doing the White House an injustice.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, so far as the Senator knows. Then what is the Senator from Ohio doing to the White House? He says that it is his opinion that the White House wants a sales tax instead of these excise taxes which the Senator from Utah and the rest of us have put into this bill. Is it any crime for the Senator from Texas to think the same as the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the National Republican Committee, who was over at the White House in intimate contact with the President about the meeting of his party?

Mr. SMOOT. No——

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Ohio feels that the President wants it, just as I feel that he wants it, because the Senator from Ohio has read in the public press that the President called into conference a great host of prominent newspaper editors from over the country. For what? To generate propaganda and to bring about pressure, through the propaganda agencies of the country, on Congress.

In that conference what did the President do? He brought up the matter of the sales tax. If he is against the sales tax, there would have been no occasion to bring it up, because it is not being pressed by the Committee on Finance, it is not being pressed by the Senate. The House has already rejected it. So, if the President brought up in his conference with newspapermen at all the questions of the sales tax, he brought it up in order to enlist their aid in driving it through this body. There can be no other inference from the fact. So I say that, like the Senator from Ohio, I believe that the President wants the sales tax instead of the excises.

I go further than that. I believe the White House wants the sales tax in preference to the income taxes offered by the junior Senator from Texas or the income taxes offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. When we scratch down below the surface of this question of a sales tax, we find that its dominating force is an effort to get rid of the income tax. It is said it is a painless tax. Yes; it is painless and a hidden tax; but if the sales tax is once incorporated in the law, because it is painless and because it is unseen, the object will be to keep it on the people, while from year to year and from time to time the high surtaxes are reduced. That is the motive power behind Mr. Mellon all these years in advocating the sales tax.

Mr. President, let us see what happened in the Finance Committee. The Secretary of the Treasury has never advocated the sales tax, at least not in the open. He came before the Finance Committee and said that he did not advocate it. He said he rejected it. He said that they had considered the manufacturers' sales tax. This is what Secretary Mills said when he first came before the committee. Here is what he said in the hearings:

> We considered a general sales tax, or turnover tax, and rejected it because of administrative difficulties, and because we considered it unsound in principle.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Did not the Secretary of the Treasury afterwards, in discussing different phases of the tax bill, justify what he called a manufacturers' sales tax and say that the only objection that they had had to it was the administrative matter?

Mr. CONNALLY. He was before the committee, I shall say to the Senator from Idaho, on a number of occasions, and I would not want to quote him from memory unless I had time to go through the hearings a little more closely.

Mr. BORAH. I was impressed with the thought that he modified the original statement he made. I may have been mistaken, but I came to the conclusion that the Secretary of the Treasury was leaning toward the sales tax.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me answer the Senator from Idaho, and then I shall yield.

My own opinion about that is that the Secretary of the Treasury has really in former years been absolutely for the sales tax. He has been for it, and probably is at heart for it now; but in making up the tax bill, back in December, it was not regarded as politically wise, probably, to include the sales tax. I am coming to the very point the Senator has in mind. I want to point out that Mr. Mills said:

> We decided to recommend, instead—

Instead of what? Instead of proposing a sales tax, the Treasury decided to recommend "a series of selective excise taxes."

That is what we have in this bill now.

Mr. JOHNSON. What was the date of that statement, please?

Mr. CONNALLY. This was on April 6, when the committee first began working on the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A representative of the Treasury on the floor, who was present when this testimony was given, said that Mr. Mills was referring to the turnover sales tax, and not to the manufacturers' sales tax. I think it is just that this statement be made.

Mr. CONNALLY. Frankly, while I have respect for the representative of the Treasury, I would rather take Mr. Mills's own printed words than the vocal utterances of one of his representatives.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will not the Senator read what went before what he quoted?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will read it all. The Secretary said:

> We considered the manufacturers' sales tax as exemplified by the Canadian law.

And he rejected it. That is the Senator's bill, is it not? That is what I am trying to make clear here.

He makes a distinction, however. He said:

> I want to make a very sharp distinction between the manufacturers' sales tax and the general sales or turnover tax. They are something totally different from the administrative standpoint, from the standpoint of pyramiding, and from the standpoint in many cases of incidence.

I do not want to read all of his testimony on this point. It is on pages 4 and 5 of the hearings. He did modify and show a little more leniency toward the manufacturers' tax, but he never came before the committee and gave his unqualified approval to a manufacturers' sales tax. If he did, I do not recall it.

The point I am making is that if the President of the United States wants a sales tax, why does he not send a message to Congress and say so? Why should he send his Secretary of the Treasury to tell the Finance Committee that they do not recommend the sales tax, but instead have recommended the excise tax, and then in a surreptitious manner, in a covert manner, seek to drive Congress into the attitude of adopting a sales tax through the manufacture of propaganda by these conferences at the White House with representatives of the press?

As I recall, the Constitution provides that the President of the United States shall advise the Congress from time to time with respect to legislation. The Constitution lays down the manner in which he shall make known to the Congress his views and his recommendations. He may make them known in person or in writing. I find nothing in that instrument which provides that the President shall proceed through agencies of propaganda, through newspaper pressure, through flattery, through flattering newspaper editors and others by calling them to the White House and making them realize their importance by being designated by the President to come to Washington to solve these questions and then going back home under the seduction of that flattery and undertaking to get Congress to do something which the President himself does not publicly and in an official way tell the Congress he wants done. I am protesting against this method of double dealing, on the one hand this method of seeming to be against the sales tax through the Secretary of the Treasury before the committee, and on the other hand this other method of seeking for political effect to drive the Senate into embracing the sales tax and then saying to the country, "We did not recommend it. We were not for it. Congress has adopted the sales tax and of course we have to accept the result."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. May I point out that the Finance Committee agreed upon what it wanted to present to the Senate. The next day the chairman had the Treasury Department come before the committee, represented by the Secretary, who had a typewritten sheet as to how to balance the Budget, and the committee accepted that. There was nothing there about a manufacturers' or any other kind of a sales tax. Is not that true?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct as I recall it.

Mr. COUZENS. There was no evidence before the committee that there was any indorsement of a sales tax, a general sales tax, or a manufacturers' sales tax, or a general excise tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. In reply to the Senator from Michigan, may I say that my recollection is in substantial agreement with what the Senator has said, that in the final so-called compromise, which was not a compromise at all, the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the committee with a typewritten list of items which would be put back in the bill and of items that would be taken out, and there was no mention of a manufacturers' sales tax at all.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is absolutely correct, but I want to call his attention to what Mr. Ballantine, the Under Secretary of the Treasury, said on this question. He said:

> The general sales tax is grossly discriminatory. In so far as the tax can not be shifted, it is distributed according to gross income, which furnishes no measure of tax-paying ability.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator for calling that to my attention. I have high regard for the Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ballantine, and for his views. I want to take this occasion to say that he was of infinite assistance to the committee during its deliberations on this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator, before he takes his seat, will comment upon the position of the American press. It has always pretended to be independent and yet we find representatives of the press going to the White House, either by invitation or by threat, and then immediately upon leaving the White House carrying on a propaganda such as indicated by the Senator. It seems to indicate that the American press lacks that independence which it has claimed in the past and which many of us would be glad to attribute to it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Utah that I have observed since being in Washington that White House food has a flavor which is much more tempting and seductive than that of the common herd. If a man is invited to the White House and puts his legs under the mahogany table along with the President, whether he be newspaper editor, public official, or private citizen, his backbone is frequently limbered up and his views are often much modified. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Texas that the White House food tastes just as good to a United States Senator as it does to a newspaper publisher? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, I said "public officials," which would, of course, include United States Senators. The Senator from Virginia must not have heard me, because I specified newspapermen and public officials and private citizens and said that White House food had a peculiar flavor and a seductive influence.

Mr. GLASS. I simply wanted to emphasize the fact that scrambled eggs and bacon at the White House do not taste any different to a newspaperman than they do to a United States Senator, and that there have been more United States Senators than newspapermen called up there.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Virginia evidently is a better judge of this matter than I am, because I am not accustomed to dining at the White House—and I do not mean to imply that he is. But he speaks with such positiveness about the situation that I accept his judgment. I do not think it makes any difference whether it is a newspapermen—and I tried to say that to the Senator—or a United States Senator or a politician or a public official or a private citizen. A little White House food bulges out their chests as well as their belts.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I say to the Senator from Texas that we are about to take a recess. I beg him not to permit men like myself to leave here in a confused state mentally at the present time——

Mr. CONNALLY. That is impossible for the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. In a confused state mentally concerning the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Under Secretary of the Treasury, I am utterly at sea, and with that intensity of desire to follow the President that is always mine, I want to be clear before we adjourn to-day, in order that my Sunday may be peaceful and may not be disturbed with thoughts of differences between or among those who represent our Government. First, I understand, from what the Senator has said, that the President has expressed no view upon this subject. But my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS], after a visit to the President, out of the circumambient atmosphere, has grasped the opinion that the President favors the sales tax.

I gather as well that the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 6th day of April last, appeared before the Finance Committee and then, in terms that can not be misunderstood, expressed himself against the sales tax. Then, I gather from what the Senator from Mississippi said, that the Under Secretary of the Treasury, not to be outdone in the expression of opinion, in writing expressed himself as against the sales tax.

And now we have permeating the atmosphere of this Chamber, and of Washington, and the press generally, the idea that the administration is wildly enthusiastic for the sales tax. Will the Senator set at rest the minds of some of us so our Sunday may be at peace, as we desire, on the question of what is the fact, to be accurately informed, notwithstanding this vicarious responsibility under the present administration?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator from California that I should be glad to reveal the real situation, and if I were as close to the White House as is the Senator from California I might be able to do so. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator from California think that the Senator from Texas or anybody else could tell him to-day what the President's views will be to-morrow?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Oklahoma that we are not concerned with what his views may be to-morrow. We are trying to find out what his views are to-day.

Mr. GORE. I was sympathizing with the distress exhibited by the Senator from California, which I believe can not be assuaged by any prophet, here or elsewhere.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, you see what Sunday means to those of like views. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the thing I want to suggest to the Senate is that if the President really wants the sales tax he should have the courage—and we hear a good deal of talk from the White House about courage in other people—to tell the Congress and the Senate that he wants the sales tax. But I object to the White House or any other agency of the Government sending the Secretary of the Treasury to the Finance Committee to oppose the sales tax and say that the administration is not for the sales tax and then through methods of propaganda and through covert influences really urging the sales tax and wanting to force the sales tax upon the Senate by political pressure and by pressure of public opinion.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] says that he believes the President favors the sales tax. Where did he get it? I think when the Senator from Ohio went to the White House he knew before he went, or believed before he went, that the President was in favor of the sales tax; but I accept the statement of the Senator from Ohio that the matter was not discussed at all. Still the Senator from Ohio believes that is the view of the President.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. If all utterances of Senators were confined to that kind of statement, there would not be so much confusion; but what is to be the interpretation when a friend like the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] makes the specific statement that when the Senator from Ohio goes to the White House and then comes out he is convinced that the President is for the sales tax? I think the Senator from California is fair enough, when I state that the matter was not discussed and that what I said did not come from the White House, not to make a statement of that kind.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator from Ohio misunderstood what I said. I said the Senator from Ohio went to the White House, that he did not discuss the sales tax, that he came out of the White House, and then out of the circumambient atmosphere he acquired the opinion that the President is in favor of the sales tax. I can not see that there is anything objectionable in an opinion being formed by the Senator—we might leave out the circumambient atmosphere and say it was formed in some other fashion.

Mr. FESS. My opinion as expressed and repeated here is wholly due to this situation. I think the sales tax would be preferable to a high excise tax, and I think that anyone who views the problem as I do would come to the same conclusion. I say that with no reference whatever to anything that I have ever heard the President state. I have assumed that between the two forms of tax the man who thinks as he does would favor the sales tax in preference to the excise taxes. That was the basis of my statement; it had nothing to do with my being at the White House last night.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas will yield to me farther, let me say if no one can go to the White House to consult about matters that are in his mind without having it alleged when he comes away that he stated that the President takes a certain view on a subject that is controverted here but which was not discussed, it is better that he should never go to the White House; otherwise the White House is brought into a discussion without any responsibility simply for the capital that might be made out of it by those who do not agree with the President.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator, in answer to his suggestion that Senators had better not go to the White House, for it is my observation that most of them who do go there get into trouble.

Let me state further that I undertook to be just to the Senator. I accepted his statement; I made no inference from it. I understood the Senator to say that when he went to the White House he believed the President was in favor of the sales tax, and I accepted the statement. The point I am trying to make is that the Senator from Ohio has been reading the same newspapers that the rest of us have been reading; the Senator from Ohio has been observing the same maneuvers the rest of us have observed; the Senator from Ohio has been listening to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who is close to the White House, and to his advocacy of the sales tax; and the Senator from Ohio, thinking, as he says, like a normal man, reaches the same conclusion that the rest of us have reached, and that is that the White House, from the secretaries up, say that they are not for the sales tax, and yet they are covertly and secretly seeking to bring pressure upon Congress to make it swallow the sales tax, which it is not going to do.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I should not like to have any misunderstanding, and I would not do the Senator from Ohio any injustice, and have not sought to do so; but to understand exactly what the Senator from Ohio means is a little beyond me. If I had the intuitive ability of Reggie Fortune, Mr. Bailey's creation, or if I had the inductive power of Sherlock Holmes, then I could understand or ascertain exactly what it is that he intends to convey and could comprehend what has been stated as actually transpiring as related by him. It seems that the situation was that the Senator from Ohio thought when he left the White House and was interrogated by members of the press that the President thought like he thought; and so, both of them thinking alike, he reached the conclusion, as I gather now from what he has said, that he gathered the conclusion that the conclusion that he had concluded was concluded by the President to be the conclusion that the President would conclude of like character with him. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that if there are any more demonstrations in the galleries he will order them cleared, including the press gallery as well as the others.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator desire me to yield to him?

Mr. LEWIS. I should like the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall conclude in a few moments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to hold hereafter that a Senator can yield only for a question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, that is satisfactory to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, anyone who knows anything knows that the House of Representatives rejected the sales tax by an overwhelming vote. Any Senator who will now investigate the situation in the House will find that the House is not going to reverse its attitude, for many reasons. One of those reasons is that they have had a roll-call vote. Members of the House are on record on this question, and they are not going to be put in the position of facing a record reversal of that vote.

Furthermore, the sales tax, according to my view, has not a majority vote in the Senate. So why take up a week or 10 days or 2 weeks of the time of the Senate discussing a sales tax when it has no chance whatever of adoption? I do not propose to go into the merits of the sales tax. I am not going to support it, and I have not supported it in the past. Mr. President, the White House, the Senate leaders, and everybody else who wants the Budget balanced ought to forego presenting this question at this time.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I want to say that the charges against the Senate and the references to a legislative jam in the Senate are unmerited and unworthy of the sources from which they come. The Associated Press dispatch with regard to the newspaper conference at the White House speaks about the "legislative jam" and the delay in the measures to balance the Budget on Capitol Hill. There is no jam here. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] very truly said on yesterday in this Chamber that the Senate had conducted the consideration of this bill more expeditiously and with less consumption of time than was the case in relation to any revenue bill that had been considered while he has been a Member of this body. The Senate has been working, as Senators know, many nights until 10 o'clock, working anxiously, vigorously, energetically, pushing this measure, and it is unjust for these charges to come from the White House or from anywhere else.

If the President wants speed, let him withdraw the agencies which he is setting in motion to propagandize the Senate and to try and bring pressure on the Senate to spend weeks and perhaps months in discussing an amendment proposing a sales tax, which tax will never be adopted by this body.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in these addresses on the tax we are hearing I have been aroused to the serious import of the meeting of the distinguished members of the press, summoned to a gathering at the White House by the President. Sirs, it is the privilege of the President of the United States to invite any person he chooses to the White House, either as a personal guest or as a guest of the public bureau known as the White House; but, Mr. President, when such invitations are extended to gentlemen who are supposed to mold the public opinion of the country, and who are individually rarely or never invited in their personal capacity to make a visit to the President in anywise whatever, we are aroused to inquire what is the object, where the hidden design, and what is the purpose. Let us reflect that many of the editors whose presence is demanded are those whose politics, it is well known, is in opposition to that for which the administration stands and often to all it represents; from this fact we can come to but one conclusion. That conclusion is that the President brought these molders of public opinion, these ambassadors of public thought, to the White House in order that he might use the power of his great office to influence their thought in behalf of that which he demands or by manner so to intimidate their situation as to obstruct their opposition.

Mr. President, there are two distinguished men who have been Presidents of this Nation who lived in our lifetime and who declined to do the things that we have seen transpire lately—once in the case of the country press, what might be called a weekly press association, and then following in the case of the present daily press association. We dwell for a moment on the instant situation. I am able to say that when such publishers and editorial gentlemen such as Colonel Knox, of the Daily News, of Chicago, formerly of the Manchester Union, of Manchester, N. H., and afterwards one of the representatives of some of the press of that eminent patriot and statesman, W. R. Hearst, and his great army of newspapers and periodicals—when such a man as Colonel Knox is chosen to be one of the captains in the management and receives the order to command these newspapermen to come from their homes and their business and assemble at the White House to receive the directions of the President of the United States, it must be that a situation of unusual character has been invoked against these gentlemen—the representatives of this newspaper citizenry.

Colonel Knox I know to be a man of eminence in his capacities, patriotism in his life, and the last man who would lend himself to aiding a form of official public pressure upon those who should have freedom of action and leave open to all America and to the world of public opinion the imputation that they were susceptible to be brought down by command by the President of the United States for obedience to orders as ancient kings did their courtiers and princes. We deplore the aspect presented similar to that vested in administration of kings—where if royal command were not obeyed the estates and the privileges of those of the royal dispensation were to be promptly revoked and the future of these underofficers deprived of the hope of reward.

Sir, two Presidents of the United States—one, Theodore Roosevelt, a distinguished Republican, and the other, Woodrow Wilson, a distinguished Democrat—were solicited to use this form of respectable bribery over the opinion of those of the press and to avail themselves of the thought that, in the emergency of the press, they would seek the favor of the Government, therefore as a bid for the favor would respond to whatever request was made, or, in the weakness of their character, would hesitate to dispute or refuse obedience to the demand. In this manner it is expected that the American editors are to become the servile servants of that royal and newly assumed arrogance on the part of those who call themselves the head of the Government; let us recall that these Presidents I name, upon reflection, upon the assembling of the gentlemen of the press, specifically did both Mr. Wilson and Mr. Roosevelt decline to allow conferences between himself and his fellow coadjutors to be confidential, taking the position that the treatise of the meetings being called for public uses were public property. These American Presidents—in the American spirit—treated all of the Americans of their country as entitled to know what was urged for them or as to them. This just position enabled the citizen to approve or oppose the demand of the President made through a misunderstanding of the conditions or because of being pressed to the action by the power of favored privilege.

Each of these Presidents I name declined to allow the impression to be left upon the public mind that, while these conferences were as to the legislation of the country, and touched the legislators who were creating the legislation, and that possibly embodied strictures upon these legislators and criticisms upon their conduct, there would be an order of secrecy put on the newspapermen. These Presidents would not give the character of a personal and private relation to the action—as the whole meet was in the relationship of gentlemen with gentlemen in private converse. Sirs, it is now known that Senators—Members of this body—were made the victims of specific discrimination, of criticism by the distinguished advisers of the White House and by the eminent President, but as to which and what confidence was so imposed and the bar of silence so fixed and erected that no reply can be made by these men who are under the charges. The world now knows that the secret whisper of the distinguished President or his directing political and financial captains charged inefficiency on certain Senators on the one hand, political obstruction by some, and personal wish to embarrass the President. To serve these purposes the designated Senators are charged with "jamming up" legislation in the Senate, defeating the immediate "balancing of the Budget," and refusing to cooperate with the President. That all this is committed as offenses to defeat the passage of the revenue bill and refuse relief to the people. Taking in all the press is left with the impress that the President measures any opposition, or opposing Senators, as deficient in capacity, and in character puny and contemptible. All of these things, we understand, were intimated to these eminent gentlemen of the press. Sirs, the object was that they should carry back the opinion of the head Executive of the Government; but these officers of the press can not speak freely of what was said of these men, which, if truly publicly reported, could give the legislators impugned the privilege and opportunity to reply, to answer the charge, to meet the indictment, to confront the malediction and their accuser. No; none of these just situations are to be allowed, but the legislators are to be fixed in the judgment of the public as unworthy the confidence of their constituents, and unworthy of the respect of their fellow citizens. This judgment is placed upon them by inference for some conduct in which, it is assumed, they have committed political sin, according to the estimate of the President. Or for the failure in some conduct which he regarded a virtue necessary to be adapted for the uses of the Nation.

Sir, if these conference are to be held pleasingly, let us say gratifyingly, let us admit, to all concerned from a social point of view, we approve wholly. But if they are to touch the public affairs of the Nation, there is no theory of American government that authorizes the sovereign power of any President to summon agencies of public opinion and there, sir, plant the seed of distinctive opposition to these men who are his coadjutors by which these who have been influenced shall move to the discharge of the task imposed, and by report and editorial reflect upon those who have never had a chance to defend themselves against the injustice of the imputation, but who are to be left before the country as unworthy the indorsement of their home fellow citizens or of the confidence of the Nation.

Mr. President, I will not assume that these gentlemen of the press are so weak in character, so menial of nature, that they must be influenced by this form of specious social bribery. I deny that because they are allowed the altitude of eminence of being able to sup with the President they become thereafter servile to serve the purposes that shall first distract the honest attention of their countrymen; then, sir, impress upon the public nature a want of confidence in their own public servants. Lastly, sirs, to discount whatever legislation the legislators may enact, of any nature whatever, as being something condemned secretly by the President, being reluctantly accepted during all the time of its operation as unworthy, and discounted of value on the assumption that the legislation were the result of legislators lending their offices to dishonorable theory and to the consummation of what would be injury to or destruction of their country.

Mr. President, when the time shall come in this Republic that a President of the United States, to carry out a purely personal pride in a political purpose or private object in financial legislation and to achieve either or all, he is by custom privileged to send for the press, and in secret conferences take up the disposition by the press of the matter and by these public agencies of the country express and indorse personal opinion of the President, all commandeered through a decree commanding silence and imposing confidential relation which bans it from being told to the country, but where it is to be expressed under the pencils of editorials of influence, and power over the legislative officials, we shall have lost the theory of the independence of the citizen on the one hand and the sovereign independence of the public servant on the other.

I invite you, sir, to the history of your land and its mother country; you must recall the fact that a great king once summoned the men who were the lieges and power of England. He sought to have them obey the order that went forth that they should not meet out upon the grounds called later Runnymede, or the Farm of the Runny Land, and should not present a protest against the royal decree of their sovereign master. They declined to attend the assemblage that had for its purpose the controlling of their actions; and it was to rebuke this very object on the part of the sovereign and his audacious impudence that sought to smother these men to silence that they subsequently met and sent forth the defiance which took its form in what is now designated in history as the great chart of political rights, the Magna Charta.

Mr. President, some good friend ought to inform the President of the United States that these manner of men who come at his bidding, out of respect to the call, but who are soon set free and left in a position where they must act as the envoys of opposition against the representatives of the people, are likely, if there remains in them the manhood natural to their nature, if their character shall remain firm according to their inheritance of an American, are more likely to repudiate the purpose of the direction and to turn promptly to defeat the purpose and oppose the very theory and measure that is assumed by the Executive. He will find later that this form of character and manhood will say—and without regard to what may be the virtue in the proposal—that if the Executive shall inaugurate the practice that in its effect is to establish in the judgment of citizens of his home, where he lives, that this editor or publisher is to be hereafter recognized as an editor who has no independence, as a publisher with no opinion; one who will not support the private interests of his home, who will not protect the welfare of the locality where he resides; and that he is only to express that by which he is ordered to do by the President of the United States through using his great office to effect the object. This editor of independence and character will turn about to reverse any course, defeat any action, overthrow any conclusion attempted to be put upon him by such means. He will take such course as evidence of his manhood and that he might preserve his own personality and prove his worth in private character, and move to hold the respect he long has enjoyed from the community in which he resides.

Mr. President, it is now well known that the distinguished President of the United States expressed to these eminent gentlemen of the press his opinion that many of the Senators of the United States were unworthy of the trust they hold; that many were disobedient of the injunction that should be obeyed as their duty; that others were without the capacity to discharge their office, and that most of them had failed in patriotism. They are held out as a band of obstructionists, unworthy the approval of their countrymen and guilty of little less than treason to their Nation.

If this is the opinion of the honorable President, he has a right to that opinion. It is his privilege, sir, to hold that opinion of the body. But I sit as one of the Members of this body, as one of the American citizens permitted from time to time to speak to my countrymen, and I do demand that the President shall treat us as he will treat every other man, if he be a courageous man and a gentleman—as he is both—and that he will speak to our faces the accusation he wishes to make against us. I beseech him, as I do all his allies, that they will not say in the secrecy of a private undertaking that which brands us in some mark of unworthiness; that in whatever opinion of us shall be expressed the President shall not put the limitation of secrecy and characterize the proceedings as the private conversation between a host and his guests. Sirs, if before any people we are to be brought to the low level of the disdain by their countrymen, at least let us have the first opportunity to meet the false estimate placed against us and to refute the wrongful imputations laid at our door.

I summon the honorable gentleman who is President of the United States to the history of these two eminent predecessors of whom I speak, which will be found in the scrapbooks of the eminent secretaries of the Presidents and corroborated by the gentlemen of the press.

I, sir, conclude by bringing to the Chair's attention, as I do to that of the Senate, that there are many men who might have supported some view who when they understand they are to be driven to it in a manner unbecoming an American and that yielding to it would leave them in contempt by the people among whom they live—that they would be held forever in the disrespect of those for whom they speak. The servants of such quality would rather maintain their independence and keep the friendship of their friends and the respect of their constituency by opposing the very thing than to have it go out that they are accepting it under the whip and lash of power on the one hand or on the other by the fear of open, public slander of press that has been inspired by orders given in secrecy.

Senators, I ask, what is this body? Is this some committee that has been organized in America to hear the voice of the President in some indirect manner and to obey it while the crouched forms of its Members in Congress submit in a manner that renders them unworthy of the attitude and position they occupy here by the sovereign will of their American citizenship? Have we come to the point where we can fall so low that the great public of our country shall recognize that we have not courage beyond adopting, sir, the challenge thrown out by surrendering to it without either the courage of a man to resent it or the power of an exalted official to punish it?

I hope there will come often the conferences of the press with the President. I hope there will come often the opportunity of the President to confer with every member of the press. I trust they may enjoy his private hospitality as citizens, and likewise engage from time to time in exchange of views as the representatives of public welfare. But I pray God that there shall never be established by any man in that power the right to hold men who are the agencies of public opinion under secret ban, and through them to pour his malediction and condemnation against public servants, particularly—as is now the true situation—where we all are public servants who are his public colleagues. I hope that these ambassadors of the press may return to their homes, yet, under no form of influence, whip the independent opinion of the public representatives into disobedience of the needs of their own people, or violation of their own honest will. Since we trust the press and the editors we know that their sense of honor will not surrender to any source to any purpose which misrepresents to the constituencies, their public officials, nor dwindle into an insignificance these faithful and independent legislators—to reduce them to a station contemptible.

I pray that we will never again, at a critical time in this Government such as now, be compelled to have the world to see that the head officer of this Government summons the great voice of the press, that they might be called together in some form, in secret assemblage, pledged to silence, where they may record the animosity of our President to our official action or his political antagonism against his colleagues in the great administration, merely because of an independent view of their own in the fulfillment of their duty in behalf of their people, and the obedience to their solemn oath before their Almighty God.

I thank the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the press statement to which I referred in what I said earlier in the Senate. I think it just and fair that this statement should go in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to call the attention of the Senate to this portion of the statement:

During the parley—

That is, the parley at the White House with the editors of the country—

During the parley, it was added, there was a full discussion also of the general legislative situation, including the possibilities of a revival of the sales tax.

The sales levy was discussed from several angles, it was explained, including the possibility of using it as a possible lever for breaking the legislative jam of Budget-balancing measures on Capitol Hill.

This is significant:

It was known that the President expressed the view that if the sales tax came up for another vote in the House it would gain far more supporters than when it was rejected.

I submit that statement, and it is from the Associated Press. Mr. President, I am not attacking the press; I am defending the press. I am defending its integrity and its freedom. Why did the President suggest to these editors that if the vote on the sales tax should come up in the House again it would get more votes, unless that was the hope and the wish of the President? These editors did not suggest that to the President; the President suggested to the editors that "If we can get up the sales tax in the House again, we shall get more votes for it than we did before."

What was the purpose? Was that to insinuate into the minds of the editors the hope and the expectation that, as a result of their gathering, they should go back home and bring the pressure of their papers, the pressure of their influence, and the pressure of their views, upon Senators and upon Representatives, to revive the sales tax and to put it across?

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], in scholarly and brilliant fashion, has adverted to the practice of having conferences with the press in secret. The Anglo-Saxon race and its history have been enriched by the story of the struggle for the freedom of the press. We stand for the freedom of the press. But if the press is to allow itself to be muzzled, if it is to allow itself to become an agency of secret propaganda, if it is to participate in conferences about which it can not talk, and the results of which it can not reveal, then the press, instead of being a free press, is to become the secret and covert agency of a vicious system of propaganda and executive pressure to stifle the free processes of government under the Constitution.

We stand in this Chamber, not because we were selected by the President, not because we are courting the favor of the President; we are here because the people of the several States sent us here to discharge our functions under the Constitution of the United States, and when the President wants to make known his views to the Congress or to the Senate, he should follow the form set out in the Constitution and send the Senate a message stating his views.

I protest against this form of secret and silent manufacture of propaganda in an effort to array the country against the Congress, and by the cunning manufacture of inspired opinion to force the Congress to do things which neither its wisdom nor its patriotism approves.

(The Associated Press article submitted by Mr. CONNALLY is as follows:)

PUBLISHERS TO AID PRESIDENT'S PLANS—PLEDGE SUPPORT IN SETTING UP NETWORK OF RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEES

Newspaper publishers who spoke at last night's conference with President Hoover were said at the White House to-day to have unanimously expressed approval of the setting up of committees in large cities similar to that under the chairmanship of Owen D. Young in New York, with the aim of helping business activity.

The President outlined a program for "reconstruction committees" of leading men. He stressed the necessity for cooperative action in this direction as a remedy for ailing business, it was said, and received from the publishers "unanimous expression of sympathy with the program."

During the parley, it was added, there was a full discussion also of the general legislative situation, including the possibilities of a revival of the sales tax.

The sales levy was discussed from several angles, it was explained, including the possibility of using it as a possible lever for breaking the legislative jam of Budget-balancing measures on Capitol Hill.

GREATER SUPPORT SEEN

It was known that the President expressed the view that if the sales tax came up for another vote in the House it would gain far more supporters than when it was rejected.

Between 25 and 30 publishers outlined their individual views and discussed conditions in their communities.

One of the President's secretaries, describing these talks, said "the dominant note was one of urging speedy action" for completing the legislative program.

There was a general expression of hope, he said, that there could be an early adjournment of Congress.

COLONEL KNOX DINNER HOST

Earlier, the publishers gathered at a meeting of their own. At a dinner given by Col. Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, definite suggestions were made for rallying the press of the entire Nation behind a drive for a speedy clean-up of pending legislation.

MONDAY, MAY 30, 1932

(Legislative day of Monday, May 9, 1932)

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, with only a few other Senators in the Chamber at this time I dislike very much to submit a unanimous-consent request for the consideration of a resolution to obtain information from the Treasury Department. If Senators think it would be better to have more Senators present, I should be glad to yield to anyone to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Finance Committee has been in session for more than an hour this morning and it was still in session when I left the committee room a few moments ago. There were 20 members of the committee attending the meeting and they will be here very soon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Dale	Kean	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the approval of the Journal for the calendar days of May 26, 27, and 28.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT ESTIMATES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be read, after which I shall address myself to it for a very few moments only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 218), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate as soon as possible the following information, to wit:

(a) As of May 31, 1932, the amount of revenue, by item, which the rates contained in the revenue bill, at the time of its presentation to the Senate by the Finance Committee, will raise.

(b) The amount of revenue by item said rates will raise as amended by the Senate up to the present time.

(c) The amount of revenue, if any, now required in addition to that estimated in paragraph (b) as necessary to balance the Budget, with contemplated economies and without provision for debt retirement.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think the resolution is self-explanatory. In December it was estimated that we were $921,000,000 short; that is, without debt retirement and with contemplated economies. In February there had been a further decline in business, and the Secretary of the Treasury then, in view of the circumstances existing in February, said that the probable deficit would be $1,241,000,000, without debt retirement and with contemplated economies.

Since February there has been a further decline in business, as we all know. Mr. Mills himself has stated that at the time he made his estimate the situation was different from that which exists at this time. The purpose of my resolution is simply to get an up-to-date estimate from the Treasury Department, so that we may see whether or not in the estimation of the Treasury Department sufficient revenue is provided for in the bill to balance the Budget.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator's resolution contemplate the adoption of the remainder of the items in the bill that have not yet been considered; for instance, lubricating oil?

Mr. TYDINGS. Paragraph (b) asks how much money the bill will raise as amended; in other words, as it stands to-day.

Mr. WATSON. That is, assuming the other portions of the bill will be passed which have not yet been considered?

Mr. TYDINGS. It assumes that they will remain constant, but with the amendments we have heretofore adopted. The third paragraph of the resolution asks how much additional revenue, if any, is required now, May 31, 1932, as we look into the business picture, to raise sufficient money to balance the Budget. It simply asks for information. The information may be discounted or discarded, but I do think before we vote on the bill we ought to have the last word from the Treasury, so we can see whether or not in the estimation of the Treasury Department sufficient money is going to be made available as a result of the passage of the bill to balance the Budget.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. There is another phase of the matter that I think is important, and that is the question of what economies are going to be made by virtue of an economy bill which will be presented to the Senate following the passage of the tax bill. The matter of how much we can economize and how much we can reduce appropriations is just as important as the estimate of the Treasury, so regardless of whether we get the information desired through the Senator's resolution, there is the uncertainty in the ultimate outcome with reference to economies Congress can make effective.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is correct, but if he will look at the committee report, he will find there was an estimated economy at the time they presented the bill to the Senate of about $260,000,000. I have assumed for the purpose of those economies that about that figure will be assumed by Mr. Mills in making his estimate. Of course, if we make larger economies or less economies, those figures will have to be changed just that much.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator from Utah if he will not state the reason for his objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I state to the Senator that all this resolution does is to ask for information?

Mr. SMOOT. I want it to go over to-day.

Mr. TYDINGS. We may vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I still have the floor, and if the Senator will give me his attention, I should like to ask him a question. I do not see how any of us here can vote intelligently upon this bill when the whole thing is predicated upon estimates of the Treasury Department and when the Treasury Department itself now says that the estimates adduced in February are not the estimates which they would present to-day.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to draw the Senator's attention to the colloquy which took place between the Senator from Indiana and myself on Saturday, in which the Senator from Indiana, speaking for the Treasury Department, said the bill was $56,000,000 short at this time of balancing the Budget. It seems to me that that is the latest information we can expect to get, when as late as Saturday it was declared by the Senator from Indiana on the authority of the Treasury Department that $56,000,000 more was needed in order to balance the Budget.

Mr. TYDINGS. Even assuming that is true, I feel, without questioning the statement of the Senator from Indiana in any way, that we should get information from the responsible governmental department. It strikes me that Mr. Mills would gladly furnish this information if the Senate would ask him for it.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, but the Senator from Indiana quoted the Secretary of the Treasury; I have all confidence in what the Senator from Indiana says, and when he says that the Secretary of the Treasury told him at that time that the bill was $56,000,000 short of balancing the Budget, I take it for granted that that statement is absolutely accurate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, I would not put myself on the same plane with Mr. Mills as a financier when it comes to dealing in millions and billions, but I am convinced, from what little study I have made of the bill, that $56,000,000 more will not touch the amount of revenue that has to be raised in order to balance the Budget. May I point out also, to use almost the exact words of Mr. Mills, that he said, "I can not make these estimates from day to day; when I made the estimates back yonder, I contemplated at that time an increase in business activity of about 20 per cent"? He counted on a pick-up in business of 20 per cent. Since then business has not even held its own; it has gone downhill. So if the estimates were based upon a pick-up of 20 per cent, and we have had a decline, certainly $56,000,000 is not going to bridge the gap.

Mr. COUZENS. I also want to point out that the Senator from Mississippi suggested on Saturday, I think it was, if we would adopt the rates on incomes proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], they would more than twice cover the $56,000,000 deficit. If we will do that, we can wind up this bill to-night.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not mean to contend that we can not balance the Budget, but certainly we should not say that we are balancing the Budget from the taxes now in the bill unless we are actually doing so.

Mr. COUZENS. What I am trying to say to the Senator is that if we adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, we can conclude this bill to-night and provide practically $56,000,000 more than necessary, which would allow for any deductions that might have to be made in the estimate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. We all know that the first estimates came to us in November and that subsequent estimates came in February. The House of Representatives passed this bill some months ago. The bill then came to the Senate; we have had it for many weeks, and during that time there has been a decrease in business activity, in certain instances amounting almost to disintegration. Therefore, the estimates made some weeks ago are not now entirely reliable.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, they are not.

Mr. WATSON. We all understand that. I stated the other day the estimates that were furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury at that time. Whether or not he has made other estimates up to this time is more than I know.

I wish to say to my friend from Michigan that I doubt very seriously whether the adoption of the so-called Connally rates would produce the amount of revenue that he estimates. My judgment, from what I have recently learned, is that even if we were to adopt the Connally rates they would not produce at the most at this time over $75,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in view of the statement just made by the Senator from Indiana, there is all the more reason why we should have the last-minute estimate of the Treasury Department.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Taking the statement of the Senator from Indiana as being 100 per cent correct, the answer to it, it seems to me, would be the adoption of the Couzens rates on incomes, which would bring up the revenue a couple of hundred million dollars more.

Mr. WATSON. That is a mooted question, I want to say to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Utah for just a moment, and then I will be glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. President, ever since the administration called the attention of the country to the deficit, we have "sold" to the country the idea that, so far as was humanly possible, the Congress was going to balance the Budget. It may not have been the right thing to do or it may have been the right thing to do, but everybody now expects us to do it, and if we do not balance the Budget, and if we go into the fiscal year 1933, and after the 1st of July has gone by it is evident that this bill does not balance the Budget, then the Treasury Department is going to issue a statement that we are running behind so many million dollars a month, and those who have been led to believe that the Budget was balanced are going to be thoroughly undeceived. I am not going to be a party to that deception without making an effort to ascertain whether or not this bill, in the eyes of the administration and in its view, does actually or does not balance the Budget.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield first to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask what is the use of debating how much revenue a single item or the entire program will produce? Here is an opportunity to obtain from the Treasury Department exactly what is the situation from its standpoint. Whether or not we believe the statement of the Treasury Department will be accurate is another proposition entirely, which may ultimately be developed; but at least that department is the only place to which we can go for an accurate determination of the amount that will be brought in under the pending measure, and we ought to proceed to get the estimate of the Treasury Department. It is of little avail, may I submit to the Senator from Maryland, for our distinguished leader upon the Republican side to say, "I do not believe if a particular scheme is presented here, it will produce more than $75,000,000 revenue," when there has been an estimate heretofore made that it will produce almost twice that much. So why not, even though it differs from 64 other estimates that may have been made by the Treasury, get a definite estimate at the present time?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield to the Senator, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only object I had in objecting to the consideration of the resolution was to secure action on the bill. So far as I am concerned, I do not care whether the resolution which the Senator has offered is adopted or not, and I will withdraw my objection in order that we may proceed with the consideration of the bill, for that is what counts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object until I express myself. The Senator from Maryland says that the Treasury has made no estimate. I say to the Senator from Maryland that the Treasury has made at least three or four estimates. The Committee on Finance has not been derelict in its duty in trying to ascertain the wishes of the Treasury Department, may I say to my good and genial friend from Maryland? The department made its recommendations to the Ways and Means Committee and stated how much was needed to balance the Budget, and the department also took into consideration to what extent the Congress would have to economize in order to balance it. They put that estimate down as low as a hundred million dollars.

Three weeks ago, about May 8 or May 7, I believe, the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Finance Committee for the last time and estimated that the Congress would bring about retrenchments of approximately $230,000,000, and if we should do that he said he would issue a statement to the country saying if the Finance Committee reported the bill as it was reported to the Senate that it was a sound, stable measure and would, according to his estimates, balance the Budget. That was his statement before the Finance Committee; that he would assume the responsibility to that extent.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me right there?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I want to ask my friend from Mississippi if that was not coupled with the statement that we should reduce expenditures by the economy bill to be brought forward by at least $250,000,000?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I stated—I am sorry the Senator was not listening at that time or did not hear me——

Mr. WATSON. I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. HARRISON. I stated that he said if Congress would cut the expenditures and bring about economies aggregating $231,000,000, he would give out such a statement as I have indicated. We brought in the bill providing revenue to that extent. Now, if we go ahead and finish the bill and carry out the recommendations of the Finance Committee as to the remaining items, of which there are merely two or three, we will need, according to the Treasury's estimate and that of Mr. Parker, of the joint committee, about $56,000,000—around $50,000,000. So if we would go ahead now and finish the bill, carrying out the recommendations of the Finance Committee on the remaining items, and then adopt the rates in the Connally amendment on income taxes, which are estimated to raise about $100,000,000 to $113,000,000, the Treasury says they will raise about $90,000,000—and Mr. Parker, I believe, estimates around $113,000,000—we will have approximately $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 more than the Treasury estimated would be required to balance the Budget, provided the Senator from Maryland and other Senators, as well as myself, will join in cutting expenditures to the extent of $231,000,000. I hope that we will cut them $300,000,000; every indication is we will cut them $250,000,000, from what I hear of the committee's work on the economy program.

I am not saying the Treasury is right in its estimate—but it is the authority in this land which is in charge of the fiscal policies of the Government; upon the estimates of the Treasury Congress has heretofore relied, and I would rather rely on them in this case than on the statements of this person or that person to the contrary. They may underestimate the prospective revenue; but, so far as I am concerned, when the Treasury says that a certain amount is necessary in order to balance the Budget and we are providing that amount and, indeed, are willing to provide $50,000,000 more than that, and are also willing to save $50,000,000 more by economy measures than they say is necessary, namely, $231,000,000, I am not willing then to say, "You are wrong up there and I am going to tax the American people from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 more than the Treasury estimates we ought to do."

So I submit that we ought to go along here in an orderly way, finish up this bill, and, as the Senator from Michigan says, we can do it by to-night if every one will put his shoulder to the wheel and stop this business of hitting over here and hitting over there and having flank movements and every other kind of movements in the consideration of the measure.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield in just a moment. What earthly harm can there be in eliciting this information from the Treasury Department? Are we to vote without the facts? Are we to have the head of the Government, responsible for its financial affairs, not now advise us when we have the statement of the Treasury Department to the effect that the situation is changing from day to day? Are we asked merely to take this bill and tell the country it balances the Budget without any figures upon which to base the statement? All the resolution asks for is information. If that is true, what objection can there be? Should we not have all the information we can get in acting upon a bill of this magnitude?

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the Senator himself has no right to yield. Senators desiring to interrupt should address the Chair and ask to be yielded to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offered an objection. I object to the consideration of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection has been made. The bill is debatable under the amendment of the Senator from Washington; and for that reason the Chair has not called attention to the objection.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. Have I the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland has the floor. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan for a question.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I point out to the Senator that as late as May 6, about three weeks ago, the Secretary of the Treasury came down with a prepared memorandum with all of the estimates; so why this resolution? Certainly there has not been enough change in three weeks to change the entire schedule of the Treasury Department. In addition to that, as the Senator from Mississippi says, we are willing to go $50,000,000 above what the Treasury asks; and then certainly we can rely upon the Treasury estimates.

Mr. TYDINGS. Even assuming that the remarks of the Senator from Michigan are accurate—and I do not question their accuracy—what reason can there be for not now asking the Secretary of the Treasury in a formal way to tell the Senate exactly what this bill proposes to do? Are we afraid of the information? Has it come to the point that we must vote without adequate information?

I did not see the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. If certain Members saw it, they can not act for me. There are other Members here who have not seen it; and what earthly reason can there be for not having this information when we come to vote on this bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think three or four days ago the Secretary of the Treasury gave out a statement through the newspapers in which he said that the bill as acted on by the Senate up to the present time plus a reduction in Government expenses of about $300,000,000 would balance the Budget. That statement, according to my recollection, was given out not more than four days ago. I merely mention that to supplement what the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Mississippi have already stated.

In that connection, may I ask the Senator how much time would be required to secure a report from the Secretary of the Treasury? Would it require time enough to incur a lot more delay in the consideration of this bill?

So far as I am concerned, I have reached the conclusion that it would be better to pass an imperfect bill and get rid of it than to stay here all summer and then pass one that might be slightly better.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us take up what the Senator from Kentucky has said in the order of his statement.

First of all, he said the Secretary of the Treasury four or five days ago gave out a statement to the press. Well, things have certainly come to a sorry pass when we have to pick up the newspapers to get our information from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Just let me finish; then I will yield. We actually have to read the newspapers; we are so cowardly that we can not actually ask the Secretary of the Treasury ourselves. We have to pick up some newspaper and see what the Secretary of the Treasury said. What I want is a formal, businesslike statement of what the Treasury Department estimates this bill will yield, and how much more money, if any, is necessary then to do what the country was told would be done—balance the Budget.

I am sold on the idea that there is not enough money in this bill to balance the Budget, and I want to quote just one isolated instance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] the other day, in the course of a very able address upon automobile taxation, pointed out that the previous estimate of the Treasury Department, based on 1931 purchases of automobiles, was that the automobile tax would yield a certain amount of money, whereas by an actual mathematical calculation the Senator from Michigan showed that only a proportion of that money would be obtained at this time by the proposed tax on automobiles. All that we had to do was to take the volume of business in 1931 and multiply it by the rate, and the figure was less than that estimated by the Treasury Department.

If that estimate was based on 1931 sales of automobiles, who in this Chamber will rise and say that in his opinion the sales in 1932 are going to equal the sales of 1931? I dare say there is not a Senator here who will make such a statement. Instead of being equal to 1931, since December sales of all business have steadily declined.

What I want now is an up-to-date estimate from the Treasury Department, upon whose estimate these rates were put in the bill, as to how much money it will raise now, looking at the situation as it now exists, at the time when we are going to vote upon it. Therefore, if it will not raise sufficient money, how much are we short, so that we can see where we can get it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the force of what the Senator says. It only illustrates, however, the fact that we have had the cart before the horse all the time in the consideration of the question of taxation and economy.

What ought to have been done, in my judgment, was for Congress in the very beginning to have reduced Government expenses, so as to know how much more would be required to balance the Budget. Instead of that, we are passing a tax bill first, and undertaking to reduce expenses later.

So it seems to me that no report that the Secretary of the Treasury might make here would throw any light upon the difference between the amount of money that will be needed now and the amount that may be needed after we have reduced expenses; and, admitting the Senator's good faith—which I always do—I am wondering whether the requirement of this report will not further confuse and delay matters, so as to bring about still greater confusion and uncertainty with respect to the passage of this bill, and greater uncertainty and confusion in the whole country as to the final action of Congress.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, when the time comes that information from a responsible head of the Government confuses the Senate, we had better adjourn anyhow.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TYDINGS. In a moment I will yield. When the time comes that we can not receive what is supposed to be the best information because it will confuse us, we had better close these doors and go on home, because there will not be any use of our staying here.

Secondly, certainly at this hour we can have the best judgment of the Treasury Department as to how much actual revenue the bill as now projected is going to raise. There can not be any question about that; and then we will know how much we have to raise even without economy, so that we can make provision if necessary to fill the gap between what we expect to raise and what will have to be raised in order to balance the Budget.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Maryland that the President can communicate with the Congress, and presumably he would communicate with the Congress, if we were about to pass a bill here which would be inadequate to meet the actual necessities of the Government. I submit in all candor that the Secretary of the Treasury could not know any more about what this bill will raise to-day than he knew on his last appearance before the Finance Committee.

At this moment we are within $47,200,000, or around $50,000,000, of what the Secretary of the Treasury then advised us he wished the bill to raise—that is to say, the amount that would be necessary to balance the Budget—and inasmuch as the President of the United States can always submit to the Congress such information as he thinks it ought to have in dealing with a matter of such vital importance as this, it does seem to me that it is a needless consumption of time and unnecessary delay to ask the Secretary of the Treasury to send down any further information to us.

With all kindness, I should like to say to the Senator that I should object to the immediate consideration of his resolution.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very sorry the Senator from Georgia will object, because it puts us in the position, according to the Senator's own statement, that we should wait until something goes wrong, and then the President of the United States should advise us that something has gone wrong, so that we can correct it.

What I want to do is to get from the responsible head of this Government, from the department charged with the estimates upon which this bill is predicated, the figure as to how much revenue it is estimated this bill as now written will raise, and whether or not there is an insufficient amount to balance the Budget, so that I can, during the rest of the day, tell whether I should vote for a higher or a lower or the fixed rate on any matter now in the bill.

I say to my friend from Georgia that notwithstanding the statement he has made that we are only about $50,000,000 short, in my humble judgment, this bill will not balance the Budget by four, five, or six hundred million dollars. Not one of these estimates is founded on actualities.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. If that is true, it is useless to call for any more estimates, because we have had estimates supposed to be based on realities, and any additional estimates would be from the same sources. In other words, I think we shall have to exercise our own judgment about the matter; and I am disposed to offer a resolution that the next Member of the Senate who mentions balancing the Budget be expelled. [Laughter.] It is used to bolster up all proposals, the unwise as well as the wise, the unjust as well as the just.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think that resolution would be very apropos if we consider that this bill is going to do that job; and if we all vote for it we ought all to be expelled, because it will not balance the Budget. But, after all, here is the real milk in the coconut:

In the face of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury says that the estimates he made when this bill was written, and those supplemental thereto, are not the estimates he would make now, we refuse to ask him, "What are your estimates as of to-day?"

I want to point out that there are Members here who think this bill ought to be rushed through whether it balances the Budget or not. They think that is the way to restore confidence in the country. They say any old kind of a tax bill is better than no tax bill, or better than a good tax bill if it is delayed.

May I point out that when the next fiscal year starts, on the 1st of July, 1932, it will not be 30 days before statements will be coming from the Treasury, unless we balance the Budget actually, that the Budget is not balanced, that we are running behind so many million dollars a month, and that the estimated deficit for the fiscal year 1933, based on present indications, will be thus and so. Where will our restored confidence have gone then? After we have sat here through this whole session and told the country we have balanced the Budget, told the country that the Federal finances are on a sound basis, and we go into the first or the second month of the new fiscal year and the truth comes out that we have not done the job, where are our Federal bonds going then? And, mind you, on top of that situation, if any kind of relief measures are passed by this session of Congress, we will be selling more Federal bonds just at that time. We will be selling extra Federal unemployment bonds just at the time the news goes out to the country that we have not balanced the Budget, after we have told them we were going to do it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TYDINGS. In just a minute.

I say that if these bonds are sold with the fact before the country that the Budget is not really balanced, it is going to affect the price of the bonds. They will sell at a lower figure than they would have sold had the Budget been balanced. Therefore, when the American taxpayer pays off these bonds he is going to make up the difference between the figure at which they actually sold with an unbalanced Budget and the higher figure at which they could have been sold had the Budget actually been balanced.

I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Treasury says that this plan will balance the Budget, does the Senator know any better method for raising doubts in the minds of the American people and the world that we have not balanced the Budget than by such speeches as he is making now?

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, because when the 30 days have gone by, the whole world will know we have not balanced the Budget. It will not be 30 days before the Treasury Department will be saying that the new tax bill will not raise sufficient money to put Federal finances on a sound basis.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will in just a moment. If we had met here in December and had told the country we were going to levy some new taxes, and that what we could not raise by new taxation we would borrow in order to balance the Budget, that would have been one thing; but all I have heard here from December until this good hour is the fact that Congress must balance the Budget, and I am not going to be a party intentionally to the hypocrisy and the sham and the deception of telling the country the Budget is balanced when I believe over half the Members of this body in their own consciences and in their own minds know that the Budget is not balanced, that the revenue will not be as great as estimated.

Now I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has given great study to this matter and, no doubt, is backed up with facts and figures. Will the Senator tell me how much will be raised in the fiscal year 1932 from the recommendations of the Treasury for increased taxation? How much increased revenue for the fiscal year 1933 will we get from the additional taxes we are to impose?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. Mills estimated in February that it would be $1,241,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. No; $1,009,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is his last estimate; that was later on. I am talking about his first estimate; his February estimate.

Mr. HARRISON. That included the estimated reduction by Congress——

Mr. TYDINGS. Of $231,000,000 in expenses, and without debt retirement.

Mr. HARRISON. The Secretary stated that this would result in increased revenue to the amount of $1,009,000,000 in 1933. Is not that right?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. How much is it for the fiscal year 1934?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not the figures on that here.

Mr. HARRISON. Is there any increase estimated?

Mr. TYDINGS. I can not tell the Senator without looking at the figures.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to tell the Senator that the figures show that it is estimated there will be between three and four hundred million dollars more in 1934 than in 1933.

Mr. TYDINGS. That on its face is an absolutely wild statement, because there is no man beneath God's Heaven who can tell whether in the fiscal year 1934 we are going to be out of the present depression, on the same plane we are now, or further down in the mire of business depression.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says that is a perfectly wild statement?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the Treasury's estimate, and that is the estimate of Mr. Parker, of the joint taxation committee. It may be a perfectly wild statement——

Mr. TYDINGS. I think it is.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Committee on Finance is taking the views of experts and not of newspapers.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me interrupt the Senator long enough to say that there is no expert on earth who knows what the year 1934 is going to bring forth. That is a pure shot in the dark, and no adding machine and no public accountant has any patent on that information. It is absolutely in the lap of the gods. The way to make the Senator's prediction come true, to make 1934 a better year than 1932 or 1933, is to actually balance the Budget 100 per cent.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me follow this up.

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HARRISON. I stated to the Senator that the Treasury's estimate and that of the Joint Committee on Taxation was that between three and four hundred million dollars more would be collected for the fiscal year 1934 than for the fiscal year 1933. The reason for that, may I say to the Senator, is that in the year 1933 they do not expect to get any of these increases in estate taxes. We do not figure anything along that line. But for the fiscal year 1934 we expect to get more than $125,000,000 out of the gift and estate taxes, and from income taxes and surtaxes and corporation taxes we will get practically twice as much as we get for this year. That is the reason why we are counting on getting more for 1934, may I say to the Senator, than for 1933.

Mr. TYDINGS. A lot of people who are expecting gifts in 1934 may find that the donors will not have the money to enable them to make the gifts when the time comes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. In just a moment. May I ask my good friend from Mississippi what earthly reason can there be for not asking the Secretary of the Treasury for his estimate? I do not care whether we agree or disagree with him; all I am asking the Secretary of the Treasury to do is to give us what he says is the best information. Can we not get that? Is there anything private in that? I do not want to hold up the consideration of the pending bill, but I am to be asked to vote in about five minutes, asked to vote for a certain schedule of taxes; I am to be told that the Treasury Department said thus and so three or four or five weeks ago, and I am to be expected to vote on that indirect information. The information ought to be before every Senator, so that when he votes he will know whether or not these taxes are necessary and whether or not they are going to raise the revenue.

Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I think we can all agree that in order to balance the Budget there must be a substantial reduction in the costs of the Government; and, second, an increase of revenue derived from various sources. I have listened to the Senator with due respect, and I gather from his remarks that he discredits the estimates of the Treasury heretofore submitted to the Finance Committee. If that be so, why invite another estimate, if we are to discredit the estimates?

Mr. TYDINGS. Because the Secretary of the Treasury himself said, at the time he made these estimates, that the condition was different from what it is to-day, so that it occurred to me that the correct and proper and sound thing to do was to say, "Mr. Secretary, what are your estimates as of to-day," or as of the time when we shall actually vote on the bill? I am not finding fault with the Secretary of the Treasury. No man can make accurate estimates of what the conditions will be. I am simply saying, Let us see what the Secretary of the Treasury says now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Within less than 10 days the Secretary made an estimate. We are not going to vote on this bill in an hour. I merely want to express this thought, that I see no particular advantage or benefit to be gained from getting another estimate, in view of the information we already have. Personally speaking, I would have no objection whatever to having the resolution passed and getting the information.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course not. All that is asked for is information.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator, and those who are trying to put over the sales tax, be willing to vote on it at not later than 3 o'clock if this resolution were passed?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would be willing to vote in half an hour.

Mr. HARRISON. We will say half an hour, then, or an hour.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would like to get the resolution adopted so that I could get the information, because if the sales tax is unnecessary I am not going to vote for it.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator yield until I submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that we vote on the amendment that is to be offered by the Senator from Massachusetts at not later than 3 o'clock to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and further because of the fact that he has not yet offered his amendment, I should feel obliged to object.

Mr. HARRISON. Could the Senator from Pennsylvania give us any indication as to when the amendment will be offered?

Mr. REED. I hope it will come soon. I hope it can come very soon.

May I say to the Senator from Maryland that any estimates we might get from the Treasury as the result of his resolution might be good to-day, but they would not be good to-morrow.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would be the first one to admit that.

Mr. REED. It is only fair that we should face the facts, that at the present moment the export of gold from this country is limited only by the amount of insurance that can be secured on the shipments in a single vessel.

Last week as much gold went out of the country on the steamers that were leaving the country as it was possible to get insurance on. To-day and Saturday the exchanges were against the United States in practically all of the exchange markets of the world. Not only were they against the United States but they were considerably above the gold export point in every one of those exchanges.

With the present deterioration of business going on, any estimates we will get to-day or to-morrow will not be good the day after. The whole world is waiting for Congress to pass a tax bill that will balance the Budget.

Mr. TYDINGS. If I may interrupt the Senator just a moment, I would like to make a statement for his information and for that of my colleagues. We met in December; the President asked us to balance the Budget; every Member of the Senate and every Member of the House agrees that the Budget should be balanced; we told the country we were going to balance the Budget; and everybody we meet on the street, with few exceptions, is for balancing the Budget.

Let us suppose that we have been too optimistic about the situation, that Mr. Mills would give us a greatly revised estimate to-day, but that we go along on the old estimate and finish this fiscal year without a balanced Budget, and go into the next fiscal year without sufficient revenue to take care of the present situation, when we know that the future situation is apt to be worse than that which we now have. Just about that time one of these relief bills, so called, will pass the Congress, in my judgment, or, perhaps, later on. The Government will be going out to sell Government bonds when its own Budget will not be balanced, when its own finances will not be on a sound basis. What will be the result? The bonds will sell at a lower figure than that at which they would sell were the Budget balanced, and that, in turn, will be reflected in the price of every share of stock and security which every private person holds.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say one thing more?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. REED. We here in Congress know we are going to balance the Budget. I think we all know we are going to do it.

Mr. TYDINGS. We are going to do our best.

Mr. REED. Our best is going to be good enough. We are going to do it. But the world at large does not believe that.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. REED. They have not any faith in it. They do not believe our assurances that we are going to accomplish it. The picture will change for the better just as soon as we have balanced the Budget, but no sooner.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. In view of what the Senator from Maryland has said and the terrible situation pictured by the Senator from Pennsylvania, does not the Senator from Maryland think that the quicker we get this bill out of the way the better it will be?

Mr. TYDINGS. Provided it will really balance the Budget.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, if the Senator will yield, I will submit another unanimous-consent request that debate on all amendments to this bill be limited to 10 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, that will have to apply after I finish talking. I do not intend to be taken off the floor in 10 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course that is up to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will say to the Senator that my resolution only asks for information. Are we afraid of the truth? That is all I am asking for, for information.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator is propounding that inquiry to me, I have not made any objection to the resolution, but I call to the attention of the Senator and of every Senator here that only three weeks ago the Secretary of the Treasury gave his estimate before the Finance Committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator recalls the figures quoted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] the other day, namely, that he would multiply these proposed levies by the total automobile business done in 1931, which would raise only about 70 per cent of the estimated revenue.

What is the use fooling ourselves? Every man with ordinary intelligence knows that the probabilities are that 1932, an election year, and with all the other factors entering into it, will not be as good a year as 1931.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WATSON. I understood the Senator from Maryland to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of his resolution. That has been objected to, has it not, by the Senator from Utah?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has.

Mr. WATSON. Does not that end it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It ends that, but the Senator from Maryland has a right to talk on the amendment which is pending, which is the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. WATSON. Of course, I have no desire to take the Senator off the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Speaking on the amendment of the Senator from Washington, may I say to the Senator from Indiana that I want to know what the Treasury estimates are, so that I can vote intelligently on the amendment.

Mr. WATSON. But objection has been made, and the Senator can not get his resolution through to-day.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to bring out a few points about the situation.

Mr. WATSON. In the interest, not of haste but expedition, let me ask the Senator if he will not forego making a speech and let us go on and pass the bill?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will do that if the Senator, being the Republican leader of this body, will be so kind as to elicit, or try to elicit, from the Secretary of the Treasury privately the information which I would like to get publicly, and will put that information in the RECORD.

Mr. WATSON. My opinion is that the Senator from Maryland himself can obtain that information from the Secretary of the Treasury if he will seek it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Perhaps I could and I would not say that I could not, but I thought perhaps the Secretary might be so busy with other matters that unless the request came from the Senate as a whole he might not want to put all his experts to work getting the information that I seek. Obviously if we do not get it to-day or to-morrow it will not be of any avail.

Here is what is going on. We might as well tell the truth about it. There is one group of Senators who want increased income taxes. Another group want the sales tax. There are proponents perhaps in each group for each one of those ideas who do not want this information elicited because perchance it may tend to defeat this or the other proposition. Here we are considering a bill based upon the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, which he himself says are out of date to-day, and we can not get the information because this body will not ask for it. Apparently it is the desire that we act upon information which we know is faulty rather than upon information which we know would be more like the truth.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is the Senator through?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I am not through, but I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. In order to balance the Budget we ought to save every dollar we can. We are losing about $2,000,000 every day we delay the passage of the bill. Already one-tenth of the day has passed to-day, and one-tenth of $2,000,000 is $200,000. I call that to the attention of Senators.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sorry the Senator did not think of that before we voted on the tariff items, which took four or five days to consider.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator from Maryland occupied more time than anyone else.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true. This is the first time, so far as I know, since I have been a Member of this body when any Senator has asked for information from the Government departments that there has been objection to it. I do not know of another time in the five years I have been here when a Senator has asked for information from a department of the Government that the information has not been forthcoming because the Senate agreed to it. If I were trying to write some policy into the bill, if I were trying to tear down the truth and place a falsehood in its stead, there would be ample room for objection; but when we have the admission of the Secretary of the Treasury himself that the estimates which he furnished to the Senate and to the committee several months ago are now out of date, we actually refuse to get up-to-date estimates and information, and yet we are going to tell the country that we are balancing the Budget.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. REED. So far as I am concerned, the Senator is talking to a jury that is already with him.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know that.

Mr. REED. I would like to see the Senator's resolution passed right away.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate that.

Mr. REED. But it has been objected to by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. He is not willing to withdraw his objection. What is the good of talking about it? Why will not the Senator write a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury and ask for the estimates, or telephone for them? I venture to prophesy that if he will do either of those things he will get a prompt answer giving the best estimate the Secretary can give.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I have just acted in advance of the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have telephoned the Assistant Secretary, who has been attending upon the Finance Committee and assisting it in the preparation of the bill. He says the items so far agreed to by the Senate—and, as I understand, he has kept up to date with his estimates—would produce about $909,000,000 of revenue; and that if the other items recommended by the Finance Committee are agreed to by the Senate it would raise a total of about $965,000,000. As I understood him, that is the estimate of the Treasury Department up to the present.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to thank the Senator, and I want to say that things have come to a sorry pass when a Senator has to get information from a Government department through another Senator. If that is true, if the information can be elicited so easily, what earthly objection can there be to immediate consideration of the resolution in order to have the facts adduced? If we can get the information in the way suggested, why not get it in a formal way?

I am going to ask the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], for whose ability and patriotism in this situation I have the highest regard, if he will not withdraw his objection and let us get the information in an official way? I would like to have it for myself. It will not overturn or upset the bill. I would like to have the information.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I shall insist upon my objection. I thank the Senator for the sentiments he has expressed toward me. I have the utmost consideration for him, but neither this bill nor any other bill that can be passed by the Congress will raise the necessary revenue unless there is an improvement in business in the country. If we delay longer the passage of the bill, we are simply gambling on the possibility of a return of business revival. By revival I do not purport to indicate a very sudden upturn, but I do believe that success of the revenue bill must depend upon a reasonable degree of confidence on the part of business and a reasonable return of business toward the normal.

Mr. TYDINGS. In view of the Senator's fixed objection, although I was hoping he would relent and recant and let us have the resolution considered, I feel that I have gone as far as I can justly go by way of obtaining the information. Not wishing to delay longer, therefore, I shall surrender the floor; but I do think it is unfortunate in this hour of great need for balancing the Budget that we have to proceed upon figures which are admittedly erroneous.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENTS OF FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at a meeting of the Finance Committee this morning quite a number of perfecting amendments, mostly administrative, were agreed to, and I now offer them and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have a copy of a telegram which has just been handed to me this morning from citizens of my State. While it does not deal directly with the proposition before the Senate, yet it does deal with the deplorable situation that confronts our people and indicates, I think, that very early action, just as prompt action as we can possibly have, must be taken to relieve the situation. I ask that the telegram may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., May 28, 1932.

D. C. BOTTING,
Manager Federated Industries,
Hotel Washington, Washington, D. C.:

Unemployment situation becoming very serious. Seattle has 58,000 on total and partial relief. Balance of State have between eighty-five and ninety on full relief, with additional forty thousand on partial relief. Shutdowns now taking place in lumber and pulp mills and other allied industries will greatly increase number unemployed. Everett pulp mill closing down June 1, will throw 1,500 more men out of work. This will add about 4,000 more people to the relief list. The Anacortes and Bellingham pulp mills are also closing down. These figures by State relief committee and Seattle unemployment relief committee. I. F. Dix, chairman. This report up to date and authentic. Please place this information in hands of Senators JONES and DILL and each Member of Congress from our State.

JOHN E. FROST,
President Federated Industries of Washington.
N. D. MOORE,
Chairman State Unemployment Relief Committee.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the telegram just read by request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] recalls the gravity of the situation touching relief of distress in the District of Columbia. Yesterday morning's press carried a statement by General Glassford, superintendent of police of the city of Washington, to the effect that the relief needs of Washington, as President Hoover made clear some time ago, demand the immediate consideration of Congress. Out of order, therefore, I ask permission at this time to introduce a bill for an emergency appropriation to meet the urgent necessities of human want in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 4781) authorizing an emergency appropriation for the relief of needy and distressed residents of the District of Columbia and for the temporary care of transient and homeless persons in said district, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented a letter in the nature of a petition from the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association No. 5, Baltimore, Md., praying for the passage of legislation consolidating and absorbing the Bureau of Navigation with and into the Steamboat Inspection Service rather than the consolidation of the Steamboat Inspection Service into the Bureau of Navigation, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Riverside Local Federation No. 8, Baltimore & Ohio and subsidiary lines, of Baltimore, Md., favoring the immediate release from prison of Tom Mooney, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Baltimore Tube Co. (Inc.), of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the imposition of a tariff duty on copper, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter from C. Blake Pitt, president of the C. M. Pitt & Sons Co., of Baltimore, Md., making certain suggestions in regard to the prompt and proper balancing of the Budget and governmental finances, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHEELER presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Montana, praying for the passage of the so-called Wheeler bill, being the bill (S. 2487) to establish a bimetallic system of currency, employing gold and silver, to fix the relative value of gold and silver, to provide for the free coinage of silver as well as gold, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Montana (identical with the above-noted petitions), which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, as follows:

CULBERTSON, MONT.

We, the undersigned citizens of Roosevelt County, Mont., believing that agriculture is one of our basic industries and that the economic security of our Nation is dependent upon the economic security of the American farm, favor such legislation as will provide for the solvency of the American farmer.

We believe that the only way out of the present depression is to raise commodity prices and thereby reduce the burden of debt. Under the present gold standard debts contracted three years ago, if paid this year, would require three times the amount in farm commodities as when they were contracted. All of the important countries of the world have gone off the gold standard except France; it is therefore impossible for us to trade with them. This keeps commodity prices down.

We feel that if prosperity is to return to this country we must go off the gold standard, which is the cause for most of our economic ills.

We therefore respectfully petition the Senate of the United States of America to pass the Wheeler silver bill, No. S. 2487, which provides for the remonetization of silver by providing for the free coinage of silver as well as gold at the fixed ratio of 16 to 1.

THE SALES TAX—EXEMPTION OF SURGICAL DRESSINGS

Mr. BARBOUR presented a telegram from Robert Wood Johnson, of New Brunswick, N. J., favoring exemption for surgical dressings in any sales-tax provision in the pending revenue bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW BRUNSWICK, May 28, 1932.

Hon. W. WARREN BARBOUR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Should Senate adopt sales tax urge no exemption whatever. Reported Senate considering exemption for medicine. If true, strongly advise exception for surgical dressing and allied products. In sickness both are essential and used widely by the medical profession and public. Both are sold by the same wholesalers and dealers and frequently manufactured by the same corporation. If policy to exempt medical products is sound then surgical dressing and allied products fall in the same category. Can I be of assistance?

JOHNSON & JOHNSON.
ROBERT WOOD JOHNSON.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10884) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust reimbursable debts of Indians and tribes of Indians, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 752) thereon.

BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. HOWELL introduced a bill (S. 4782) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Arthur R. Saffran (with accompanying papers), which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENT

Mr. CUTTING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 262, after line 2, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. —. EXEMPTION OF ARTICLES MANUFACTURED OR PRODUCED BY INDIANS

"No tax shall be imposed under this title on any article of native Indian handicraft, manufactured or produced by Indians on Indian reservations, or in Indian schools, or by Indians under the jurisdiction of the United States Government in Alaska."

AMENDMENT TO WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 11897, the War Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Insert the following at the end of the item entitled "Rivers and Harbors":

"Provided further, That the existing project for the improvement of the Miami River, Fla., authorized by the rivers and harbors act, approved July 3, 1930, is hereby modified to include the improvement recommended by the Chief of Engineers in the report submitted in Senate Document No. 95, Seventy-second Congress, first session, provided that the authorization of $800,000 for the existing project shall not be increased but is hereby continued as the total authorization for the project as herein modified."

COINAGE OF SILVER

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency the text of a bill "To amend the law in respect of the standard fineness of silver coins current in the United Kingdom and in other parts of His Majesty's Dominions," as passed by the British Parliament in 1920, together with certain extracts from the official report of the parliamentary debates in the House of Commons during that year. I also ask leave to have printed in that connection a copy of a letter which I recently addressed to the Director of the Mint and his reply thereto.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SILVER COINAGE BILL

(Memorandum)

The object of this bill is to restore the token character of the silver coinage.

Owing to the rise in the price of silver from its pre-war level of something under 30d. per ounce to the present price of about 88d. per ounce it is not possible to mint British silver coins except at a loss. It is proposed by the bill to reduce the fineness of the silver in the coins hereafter minted from 925 fine to 500 fine; with silver at 88d. The intrinsic value of a 1-shilling piece 500 fine will still be considerably more than the intrinsic value of a 1-shilling piece 925 fine in July, 1914.

A bill (as amended by Standing Committee B)

To amend the law in respect of the standard fineness of silver coins current in the United Kingdom and in other parts of His Majesty's dominions.

Presented by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, supported by Sir Auckland Geddes and Mr. Baldwin.

Ordered by the House of Commons to be printed March 2, 1920.

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. (1) The first schedule to the coinage act, 1870, as amended by section 2 of the coinage act, 1891, shall as regards coins made after the commencement of this act have effect as though for the words "thirty-seven fortieths fine silver, three-fortieths alloy; or millesimal fineness 925," in the column relating to standard fineness there were substituted the words "one-half fine silver, one-half alloy; or millesimal fineness 500," and as though for the figure "4" in the column relating to the remedy allowance in respect of millesimal fineness there were substituted the figure "5."

(2) Where by virtue of a proclamation made under section 11 of the coinage act, 1870, the whole or any part of that act is in force in any British possession at the date of the commencement of this act, that act shall as from that date apply in that possession as amended by this act, and any order in council or proclamation directing that any coins which under the coinage acts, 1870 and 1891, are legal tender in the United Kingdom shall be current and legal tender in any British possession shall extend to coins which are legal tender in the United Kingdom under those acts as amended by this act.

Provided that the provisions of this subsection shall not apply as respects any self-governing dominion unless and until those provisions are adopted as regards the dominion by a proclamation of the governor-general or governor.

2. The standard trial plates of silver to be used for the purpose of the trial of the pyx shall, instead of being made of a standard fineness in conformity with the provisions of the coinage acts, 1870 and 1891, be made of pure silver.

3. (1) This act may be cited as the coinage act, 1920, and shall be construed as one with the coinage acts, 1870 to 1891, and those acts and this act may be cited together as the coinage acts, 1870 to 1920.

(2) In this act the expression "self-governing dominion" means the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, and Newfoundland.

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES—SILVER COINAGE

(February 16, 1920)

Mr. Stewart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimated amount of silver subsidiary coinage per capita of the population was held in the United Kingdom before the war; what amount of silver had been purchased and coined during the war; what is the estimated amount per capita in the hands of the public at the present time; and whether, in view of the risk of higher prices should the coinage be depreciated, there is any need of an increase in subsidiary coinage at the present time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The answer to the first part of the question is approximately 13s. per head; to the second and third parts about £33,000,000 (net) face value and about 27s. 6d. per head. I do not think the increase of the subsidiary coinage, which is legal tender up to a very limited amount (40s.) has any appreciable bearing on the increase of prices of which it is a consequence rather than a cause.

SILVER COINAGE—BRITISH POSSESSIONS

(February 26, 1920)

Mr. D. Herbert asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies in what British possessions outside Great Britain, British silver coinage is legal tender, and in which of such possessions there is any, and what limit on the amount for which British silver coinage is legal tender?

Lieutenant Colonel AMERY. British silver coinage is legal tender in the following dominions, colonies, and protectorates to the amount shown:

LEGAL TENDER

Commonwealth of Australia, up to 40s.
New Zealand, up to 40s.
Fiji, up to 40s.
Union of South Africa, up to 40s.
Rhodesia, up to 40s.
Basutoland, up to 40s.
Bechuanaland, up to 40s.
Swaziland, up to 40s.
Nyasaland, up to 40s.
Gibraltar, up to 40s.
Malta, up to 100s.
Gambia, no limit.
Gold Coast, no limit.
Nigeria, no limit.
Sierra Leone, no limit.
Bahamas, no limit.
Barbadoes, no limit.
Bermuda, no limit.
British Guiana, no limit.
Jamaica, no limit.
Leeward Islands, no limit.
Trinidad, no limit.
Grenada, no limit.
St. Lucia, no limit.
St. Vincent, no limit.
Falkland Islands, no limit.
St. Helens, up to 40s.

SILVER COINAGE

(March 2, 1920)

Mr. Stewart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the amount coined since August 4, 1914, of the various denominations of silver coinage—3 pence, 6 pence, 1 shilling, 2 shillings, half a crown, 4-shilling piece, and 5-shilling piece.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Since August 4, 1914, the following British silver has been coined and issued by the mint:

3d. pieces to the value of	£1,126,060
6d. pieces to the value of	2,641,325
1s. pieces to the value of	8,156,658
2s. pieces to the value of	10,114,605
2s. 6d. pieces to the value of	16,187,722
Total	38,226,380

No 4s. pieces have been coined since 1880 and no 5s. pieces since 1902.

SILVER COINAGE

(March 12, 1920)

Mr. Bartley Denniss asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the per capita circulation of silver before 1910; and how much it is now as shown by the mint returns.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The per capita circulation of silver coin in the United Kingdom is estimated at about 11s. in 1910 and about 27s. 6d. now.

Mr. Denniss asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the profit to the Treasury in 1915 and 1916 on the coinage of silver; what will be the profit when the amount of the silver is reduced in the coinage under the silver coinage bill when passed; and whether 5s. notes would sufficiently achieve his purpose and yield a large profit in addition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The profit on silver coinage was £4,694,378 in 1915 and £4,445,586 in 1916, the issues in these years being exceptionally large. It is not possible to say what it will be on the new coin, as that depends on the amount of coin issued in any given year and the price at which the necessary silver can be obtained. Five shilling notes would not obviate the necessity of coining smaller denominations of silver coin, and would be open to many objections which do not apply to metallic currency.

Mr. Denniss asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has considered the effect of the introduction into the Nigerias of a five-tenths in place of a nine-tenths English silver coinage, and whether he will make up any loss to the native holders of English coins saved up by them when the contemplated new English silver coinage is introduced into those colonies?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. These are matters for the consideration of the West African Currency Board, which is responsible for the currency of Nigeria, and to whose reserves profits on existing West African silver coinage accrue. It is not likely that any of the new British silver will be bought by the board for issue in West Africa.

SILVER COINAGE

(March 16, 1920)

64. Mr. Oman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that the price of silver had fallen from 88d. per ounce to 69d. in the last fortnight, and that the profitable coinage of silver money at the old rate of purity can be resumed at a profit when silver has fallen to 66d. per ounce, he will suspend the issue of new currency of silver at the lowered purity.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir. I can not accept this suggestion.

SILVER COINAGE

(June 15, 1920)

Col. L. Ward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the recent fall in the price of silver, it will still be necessary to debase the coinage by taking advantage of the coinage act of 1920.

Mr. BALDWIN. It is proposed to proceed with the recoinage of British silver coins at 500 fineness. As I have more than once explained, there is no question of "debasing" the coinage. What is in question is the production of a token coinage of which the intrinsic value will not be likely to exceed the face value in any circumstances.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 27, 1932.

Mr. R. J. GRANT,
Director of the Mint, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation over the telephone, I shall be obliged if you will send me answers to the following questions:

"What is the highest price per fine ounce which could be paid by the British Government for coinage into half crowns, shillings, sixpence, etc., of present weight and nine-tenths fine with the pound sterling stabilized at to-day's gold value of $3.68? What is the maximum price for silver with the value of the English pound fixed at $4? At $3.50?

Yours very sincerely,

CARL HAYDEN,
United States Senator.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 27, 1932.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HAYDEN: In response to your telephone request, I am forwarding the replies to your inquiry.

The highest price per fine ounce which could be paid by the British Government for coinage into half crowns, shillings, 6-pence, etc., of present weight and nine-tenths fine with the pound sterling stabilized at a gold value of $3.68 would be $1.124 plus.

The maximum price of silver with the value of the English pound fixed at $4 would be $1.222 plus.

The maximum price for silver with the value of the English pound fixed at $3.50 would be $1.069 plus.

Very truly yours,

R. J. GRANT,
Director of the Mint.

CHIEF JUSTICE ROGER BROOKE TANEY

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, of the many sons of Maryland adorning the pages of history, there is none more outstanding than Roger Brooke Taney, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Born in Calvert County, Md., in 1777, he began the practice of law in Frederick, the county seat of Frederick County, in 1801; served as a member of the Maryland State Senate from Frederick County from 1816 to 1821; was attorney general of Maryland from 1827 to 1831; Attorney General of the United States by appointment of President Andrew Jackson from 1831 to 1833; Secretary of the Treasury from 1833 to 1834; and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States from 1836 until his death in Washington in 1864.

Chief Justice Taney administered the inaugural oath to seven Presidents of the United States, Martin Van Buren, William Henry Harrison, James K. Polk, Zachary Taylor, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, and Abraham Lincoln, inducting into office more Presidents than any other man in American history.

At the age of 80 years Chief Justice Taney wrote the opinion in the Dred Scott case. Following the flood of villification which burst upon him and which he bore with remarkable tranquillity, in a letter to President Pierce he said:

> At my time of life, when my end must be near, I should have enjoyed to find that the irritating strifes of this world were over and that I was about to depart in peace with all men and all men in peace with me. Yet perhaps it is best as it is. The mind is less apt to feel torpor of age when it is thus forced into action by public duties. And I have an abiding confidence that this act of my judicial life will stand the test of time and the sober judgment of the country.

The paradox in Taney's life becomes vivid when upon examining the record we find that Taney set his own slaves free.

The profound legal learning, passionate courage, dignity, and steadfastness which marked his service during the trying years preceding the Civil War went far toward shaping this critical period of the Nation's life and left its deep imprint upon national as well as local history.

No less impressive was the remarkable judicial poise which he exhibited during his long tenure of office, and his calmness in the face of exciting controversy, struggle, criticism, and abuse gave him an unassailable place in American history as a man of rare character and high attainments.

The original home of the late Chief Justice Taney was opened as a national shrine on April 15, 1930, in Frederick, Md., and on September 26, 1931, at the unveiling of a bust of Taney at the shrine, Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes paid a magnificent tribute to his great predecessor in an address which, in my opinion, should become public record, be given as wide a distribution as may be possible, and be preserved for posterity.

I ask unanimous consent that the address of Chief Justice Hughes delivered at that time be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES ON THE UNVEILING OF THE BUST OF CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY, AT FREDERICK, MD., ON SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1931, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

You have graciously permitted me to share in this tribute to the eminent jurist who in this community laid the foundation of one of the most distinguished careers in American annals. I respond to your invitation not only with gratification but with a keen sense of obligation. The Justices of the Federal Supreme Court are not merely titular successors in important official duties, but inheritors and developers in a continuous process of exposition, and thus enter with a lively consciousness of fellowship into the problems, the anxieties, and the achievements of those who have preceded them in their necessary but difficult task as weavers of the fabric of constitutional law.

The life of Roger Brooke Taney covered the period in which our institutions were created and solidified. He was born within the year following the Declaration of Independence, as the fortunes of Revolution hung in the balance, and he died in the closing days of the Civil War. He was admitted to the bar in 1799, and his professional activity was practically coterminus with the judicial service of John Marshall whom he succeeded as Chief Justice in 1836. For over 28 years—a time of bitterest controversy ripening in tragical conflict—he presided over the Supreme Court, maintaining in the face of rancorous criticism, and amid the excesses of passion, a serenity and dignity, as well as a conscientious devotion to his task, which won the highest praise from the ablest and most discriminating of his associates, whose appreciation of character and talent was not impaired by either political or judicial disagreement.

Entering upon professional practice in Frederick in the year 1801, Taney could not but be inspired by the traditions of the illustrious Maryland bar. It was a period favorable to the development of lawyers. Legal education, it is true, was but rudimentary. But there was opportunity to know all that was necessary to meet the demands of the day. Painstaking study was required, and Taney tells us that "for weeks together" he "read law 12 hours in the 24." In speaking of his early efforts in special pleading, he says: "Chitty had not made his appearance, and you were obliged to look for the rule in Comyn's Digest, or Bacon's Abridgment, or Viner's Abridgment, and the cases to which they referred; and I have sometimes gone back to Lilly's Entries and Doctrina Placitandi—in searching for a precedent." Still, it was not difficult for a diligent, capable student to become familiar with all the law that had been declared here and in England, and also to have an appropriate acquaintance with Roman law. And Taney had what Willim Wirt called a "moonlight mind." The comparative paucity of material in published reports of judicial decisions made mastery the easier, and in questions of substantive law principles were more important than precedents. Developing communities and evolving institutions presented problems and interests worthy of the keenest minds, and it was a golden age for those who were apt in disputation. Questions were large and populations small, and superior ability shone forth with an opportunity which was more sparingly granted in subsequent days of a more crowded rivalry and a higher average of attainment. Eloquence was the crown of forensic effort and the methods of the courts favored those who had a talent for oratory. Oral arguments were expansive. Even at a much later time, a competent observer of the arguments of eminent lawyers in the highest tribunal was able to say that "one of the learned counsel occupied an entire day for the purpose of demonstrating this very difficult proposition in America, that the people are sovereign; and then pursued his argument on the second day by endeavoring to make out the extremely difficult conclusion from the first proposition, that being sovereign they had a right to frame their own constitution." From the beginning, argumentation was broad as well as deep, and successful lawyers were noted quite as much for the display of polemical powers and ambitious rhetoric as for acute analysis and precise reasoning. It was in this leisurely and congenial atmosphere of the courts that the abilities of both statesmen and jurists were ripened.

The bar of Maryland enjoyed a distinction second to none. Frederick is honored by the memorial, not only of Taney but of Thomas Johnson—who had the distinction of nominating Washington to be Commander in Chief—the first Governor of Maryland and appointed by Washington to be Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the galaxy of great Maryland lawyers of the earlier day we find such eminent names as those of William Paca; Daniel Dulany, of Daniel; Jeremiah Townley Chase; Luther Martin (in his prime the acknowledged leader of the bar); and two who were appointed Associate Justices of the Federal Supreme Court, Robert Hanson Harrison and Gabriel Duvall. In the period of Taney's professional activity there were in addition to Luther Martin and aside from Taney himself such outstanding Maryland lawyers, to mention but a few, as William Pinkney (of whom Marshall is reported to have said, "He was the greatest man I have ever seen in a court of justice," and whom Webster described as the greatest of advocates), Robert Goodloe Harper, William Wirt, William H. Winder, Francis Scott Key (Taney's brother-in-law and fellow student, who wrote the Star-Spangled Banner), and younger but rising rapidly, Reverdy Johnson. It was under the influence and example of such illustrious inspirers and associates that Taney practiced law. After 22 years in this community he removed to Baltimore, following in recognized leadership in the footsteps of Martin and Pinkney until Wirt came a few years later to divide the honors. Political distinction now awaited Taney. After serving as attorney general of Maryland he was appointed by President Jackson in 1831 Attorney General of the United States and Secretary of the Treasury in 1833. I shall not attempt to review his brief political career, the circumstances of the acrid controversy over the removal of Government deposits from the United States Bank, or the animosities which were aroused, so violent and implacable that they led to the rejection by the Senate of Taney's nomination as Secretary of the Treasury and later of his nomination (although it met with Marshall's favor) as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Thus rejected in 1835, within little more than a year as a result of changes in the Senate but after a long struggle he was confirmed by the Senate as Chief Justice, and his judicial career, with its momentous consequences, began.

There were no sufficient grounds for the attack upon Taney's qualifications. Henry Clay, who, with Webster, determinedly opposed Taney's confirmation, later magnanimously admitted his error, and with a depth of feeling that did him credit told the Chief Justice himself: "Mr. Chief Justice, you know that in my place in the Senate before your nomination to the office you now fill was submitted to that body, as well as during its consideration, I said many harsh things of you * * *. But I now know you better. * * * I am now convinced that a better appointment could not have been made." Clay came to feel, as he said, that the ermine so long worn and honored by Marshall had fallen upon a most worthy successor. It would have been a difficult undertaking in the best circumstances to succeed the great Chief Justice, but the acrimony of partisan criticism made Taney's task one which required an exceptional equipment of courage, firmness, and judicial equanimity. Apart from mere partisan bias, there was, indeed, a strong feeling among his opponents that under the new leadership of the court the principles of constitutional construction, which the genius of Marshall had established against vehement and continuous assaults most ably directed, would be undermined and that the essential authority of the Nation would be placed in serious jeopardy. But Taney had been a Federalist, and while his judicial work came to be distinguished for his support with the force of profound conviction of the power of the States "over their own internal police and improvement"—a power the exertion of which was especially demanded by economic changes—still he recognized in many notable opinions the importance of maintaining national authority and its supremacy within its constitutional domain.

Thus, in the case of Holmes v. Jennison (14 Peters, 540), Chief Justice Taney, dealing with the question of extradition, emphasized the exclusive power of the United States in foreign relations. "It was one of the main objects of the Constitution," said he, "to make us, so far as regarded our foreign relations, one people and one Nation; and to cut off all communications between foreign governments and the several State authorities. The power now claimed for the States is utterly incompatible with this evident intention and would expose us to one of those dangers against which the framers of the Constitution have so anxiously endeavored to guard." In Marin v. Waddell's Lessee (16 Peters, 367), the Chief Justice in determining the extent of the authority of New Jersey over lands under tidewaters held that the rulings of the State court upon the construction of early instruments not framed by the people of New Jersey, but were royal charters under which rights were claimed by the State on the one hand and private individuals on the other—although the decision of the State court was entitled to great weight—did not bind the Federal tribunal. Taney concurred in the ruling in Dobbins v. Erie County (16 Peters, 435) that a State had no power to tax the compensation fixed by Federal law of a Federal internal-revenue officer. While as his biographer, Doctor Steiner, of this State, has observed, "Taney never got over the feeling that the commerce clause should be somewhat narrowly construed," it should not be overlooked that the Chief Justice took part in the decision in Cooley v. Port Wardens (12 Howard, 299), which, after the uncertainty caused by the diverse opinions delivered in the License cases (5 Howard, 504) and the Passenger cases (7 Howard, 283), established a principle which has been of the greatest value in solving the difficult problems constantly recurring in the effort to maintain in relation to the highly important subject of commerce the constitutional balance between State and national authority. Said the court in the Cooley case, speaking through Mr. Justice Curtis, with the concurrence of the Chief Justice: "Now the power to regulate commerce embraces a vast field, containing not only many but exceedingly various subjects, quite unlike in their nature, some imperatively demanding a single uniform rule, operating equally on the commerce of the United States in every port; and some, like the subject now in question (pilotage), as imperatively demanding that diversity which alone can meet the local necessities of navigation." And this consideration of a question pertaining to navigation led to the announcement of the more comprehensive doctrine that has since prevailed: "Whatever subjects of this power are in their nature national, or admit only of one uniform system or plan of regulation, may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress." It may also be recalled that one of the early appearances of Taney as counsel before the Supreme Court of the United States was in the case of Brown v. Maryland, in 1827 (12 Wheaton, 419), the "original package" case, where the court, rejecting Taney's contention, decided that the Maryland statute imposing a license tax upon importers was unconstitutional as a tax on imports and an interference with foreign commerce. Thirty-four years later, in deciding Almy v. California (24 Howard, 169), which held a State stamp tax on bills of lading of commodities transported from the State to be unconstitutional as a tax on exports, Chief Justice Taney followed the decision in Brown v. Maryland, in opposition to the position he had taken as counsel, and commented upon Chief Justice Marshall's opinion as showing that the former case had been "carefully and fully considered by the court."

With respect to the admiralty jurisdiction, Chief Justice Taney was even more "national" than Marshall himself, and the decision of the court in the case of the Genesee Chief (12 Howard, 443) departing from the views of Marshall and Story, recorded an advance which has been called revolutionary in the conception of Federal power. The court decided, in a powerful opinion of the Chief Justice, that the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts of the United States extended over navigable waters, although not tidewaters (thus embracing, for example, the Great Lakes), when commerce is carried on between different States or with a foreign nation. "Now," said Chief Justice Taney, "there is certainly nothing in the ebb and flow of the tide that makes the waters peculiarly suitable for admiralty jurisdiction, nor anything in the absence of a tide that renders it unfit. If it is a public navigable water, on which commerce is carried on between different States or nations, the reason for the jurisdiction is precisely the same. And if a distinction is made on that account, it is merely arbitrary, without any foundation in reason." In this substitution of sound reasoning based upon essential national interests, in place of an ultra conservative adherence to the precedents of English law established under different conditions, Taney was at his best.

It is unfortunate that the estimate of Chief Justice Taney's judicial labors should have been so largely influenced by the opinion which he delivered in the case of Dred Scott. (19 Howard, 393.) It would be futile at the present time to reexamine the circumstances and consequences of that historic controversy. It should be said, however, that the charge, which formed part of the violent and malignant attack upon the decision, that it was the result of a conspiracy or political bargain had not the slightest foundation. Whatever may be said of the merits of the case or of the scope of the court's determination, or of the reasoning employed, there can be no doubt of the integrity of the members of the court and of the sincerity of the action of the Chief Justice, who thought he was rendering a national service. In looking at the background of the decision, it is apparent that there was a fundamental error in the supposition that the imperious question which underlay the controversy could be put at rest by a judicial pronouncement. That issue was beyond the resources of the forum or of the legislature—it was an issue definitely settled by the arbitrament of war. With that settlement, the Dred Scott case passed into history as an event pregnant with political consequences of the highest importance, and having a most serious effect upon the prestige of the court, chiefly because of the unbridled criticism induced by the temper of the times, but having a negligible influence upon the development of the constitutional jurisprudence with which we are now concerned.

At this time, in calm retrospect, rejoicing in national unity and in the collaboration of a peaceful people, we may make a juster appraisement than was possible in the passionate days of civil strife. Nothing could be more unjust than to estimate the judicial work of the days of Taney by a disproportionate emphasis upon the decisions which were called forth by the vexed questions growing out of the institution of slavery and the prospect of its extension. Rather I should like to take this opportunity to recognize the important service of Chief Justice Taney in setting forth principles that are guiding stars in constitutional interpretation, to some of which I have already alluded.

At once upon taking office the Chief Justice was confronted by the long-standing controversy over the Warren Bridge between Boston and Charlestown, Mass., presenting the question whether the contract contained in a corporate charter providing for a toll bridge was impaired by a later grant to another corporation of the right to build a parallel bridge. The case was argued by the most distinguished counsel and aroused the keenest interest. Against strong dissent the new Chief Justice sustained the statute under review (11 Peters, 420), laying down the principle that in the absence of express provision a grant by the State of exclusive privileges was not to be inferred. While vigorously attacked at the time, the soundness of this principle and its importance to a developing country have been generally recognized. The forward look of Taney may be noted in his words describing the consequences of a different decision: "We shall be thrown back to the improvements of the last century and obliged to stand still until the claims of the old turnpike corporations shall be satisfied; and they shall consent to permit these States to avail themselves of the lights of modern science and to partake of those improvements which are now adding to the wealth and prosperity and the convenience and comfort of every part of the civilized world. Nor is this all. The court will find itself compelled to fix by some arbitrary rule the width of this new kind of property in a line of travel, for if such a right of property exists we have no lights to guide us in marking out its extent."

This freedom of development was again aided by the opinion delivered by the Chief Justice in Bank of Augusta v. Earle (13 Peters, 519), holding that in the absence of legislation to the contrary the consent of a State upon the principle of comity would be presumed to the making of contracts within its borders by a corporation of another State. To Justice Story, who had vigorously dissented in the Warren Bridge case, Taney's opinion in the case of the Bank of Augusta gave no little gratification, which he emphasized in a letter to the Chief Justice, saying that the opinion did "great honor to yourself, as well as to the court." To those who found it difficult to understand the effort of the justices of the court to deal with each case in an objective spirit and to declare the law conscientiously and with judicial independence, the decision gave "consolatory reflection" that "the fears of judicial radicalism had not been realized." Indeed, the apprehension that the constitutional protection against the impairment of contracts had been seriously weakened by the decision in the Warren Bridge case was proved to be unfounded by the opinion of Chief Justice Taney in Bronson v. Kinzie (1 How. 311). That decision held invalid a State statute which was representative of a popular class of legislation endeavoring to succor debtors in a period of extreme economic depression by changing the rights of mortgagees. The views of the Chief Justice on the importance of the reserved powers of the State were not open to question, but with notable courage he also maintained against much clamor the constitutional safeguard against impairment of the obligation of contracts, observing in his opinion that the purpose of the constitutional provision was not "to protect a mere barren and abstract right, without any practical operation of the business of life"; that it was "to maintain the integrity of contracts and to secure their faithful execution throughout this Union by placing them under the protection of the Constitution of the United States." This decision, however, evoked opposition so intense that it was now a Senator from Illinois who proposed an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the Supreme Court from declaring void any act of Congress or any State regulation on the ground that it was contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Later, in 1848, when the court in West River Bridge Co. v. Dix (6 How. 507), sustained the State power of eminent domain, which had been exercised with respect to a toll bridge, it was recognized that the court's views as to the maintenance of contracts did not lead to the denial of State power appropriately exercised.

A few years thereafter, in Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company v. Debolt (16 Howard 416), Chief Justice Taney strongly upheld the principle that corporate privileges, that case being one of tax exemption, were not to be regarded as conferred by implication. His point of view with respect to corporate charters was emphasized in words frequently quoted: "For it is a matter of public history, which this court can not refuse to notice, that almost every bill for the incorporation of banking companies, insurance and trust companies, railroad companies, and other corporations is drawn originally by the parties who are personally interested in obtaining the charter; and that they are often passed by the legislature in the last days of its session, when, from the nature of our political institutions, the business is unavoidably transacted in a hurried manner, and it is impossible that every member can deliberately examine every provision in every bill upon which he is called to act. On the other hand, those who accept the charter have abundant time to examine and consider its provisions before they invest their money. And if they mean to claim under it any peculiar privileges or any exemption from the burden of taxation it is their duty to see that the right or exemption they intend to claim is granted in clear and unambiguous language." Where the grant of a particular privilege or exemption was, as he thought in the Piqua Bank case (16 Howard 392), "too plain to admit of any other construction," he sustained it. Thus did Chief Justice Taney seek to maintain the constitutional balance.

In another field the opinion delivered by the Chief Justice for the court established the important doctrine that the court will not undertake to decide political questions and that controversies under the constitutional guaranty of a republican form of government are for the consideration and action of the Congress. It is true that Taney sought to carry the application of the principle too far when, in the earlier part of his service, he opposed the view that the court had jurisdiction of a boundary dispute between States (12 Peters 752), a jurisdiction which has since been frequently exercised to great public advantage. But in the contest arising out of the Dorr rebellion in Rhode Island, the principle that the Chief Justice held so tenaciously was applied in dramatic circumstances (7 Howard 1). That was a case full of opportunities for the emergence of the political views supposed to be entertained by the majority of the members of the court, but the decision disregarded the wishes of party and recorded the triumph of dispassionate judicial deliberation. It was a contest in which the fundamental principles of popular government were thought to be involved, and intense feeling had been aroused among its champions. On the other side were the sturdy opponents of Loco-Focoism. But, said Chief Justice Taney, the question of the legitimacy of the government in the State was a political one upon which the court had no authority to pass. "For," said he, "as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the Government and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue; * * *. Yet the right to decide is placed there and not in the courts." Thus the court maintained the surest safeguard of its appropriate jurisdiction by refusing to become entangled in political controversies with which it had no concern. This salutary doctrine was recently applied by the court in an opinion by Chief Justice White in the Oregon case, where the court refused to deal with a controversy arising out of the adoption in that State of the initiative and referendum (223 U. S. 118).

Chief Justice Taney had deep-seated convictions as to the constitutional right of personal liberty, and even in the stress of Civil War, and at the risk of violent abuse, to which, indeed, he was subjected by those whose excess of patriotism outran their intelligence, he maintained that right against the Executive, deciding (when sitting in the Circuit Court in 1861) that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus had been beyond the powers of the President. (Tyler's Memoir, Appendix, p. 646.) The Chief Justice was then 84 years of age. He had suffered during the years following the Dred Scott case the gravest assaults upon his judicial action and personal character; but, while frail in body and deeply grieved, he was still fearless in spirit, vigorous in mind, and unshaken in will. He was ever ready without hesitation to do his duty as he saw it. It was after his death that the principles which he had set forth were vindicated by the pronouncement by the Supreme Court in the Milligan case (4 Wallace 2) which buttressed individual rights with the memorable declaration: "The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. * * * Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open, and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction. It is also confined to the locality of actual war."

The crown of the judicial career of Chief Justice Taney is found, I believe, in the opinion he delivered for the Supreme Court in Ableman v. Booth, in 1859 (21 Howard 506). The case grew out of the violation of the fugitive slave law, but the permanent importance of the decision lay in its relation to the maintenance of the authority of the Federal judiciary. Booth, convicted in the Federal court for violation of the Federal law, had been released on writ of habeas corpus by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, which pronounced the Federal law invalid. The hostility to the Supreme Court of the United States and deliberate and open antagonism to its authority, which had been proclaimed in earlier days in the South, and had found expression in Ohio and California, were now voiced in Wisconsin and elsewhere under the stress of antislavery sentiment. In most forcible language and with luminous reasoning, Chief Justice Taney's opinion set forth the essential supremacy of the Federal tribunal within its sphere under the Constitution and laws of the United States. "The Constitution," said he, "was not formed merely to guard the States against danger from foreign nations, but mainly to secure union and harmony at home; * * * and that, in the sphere of action assigned to it" (the General Government), "it should be supreme, and strong enough to execute its own laws by its own tribunals, without interruption from a State or from State authorities. And it was evident that anything short of this would be inadequate to the main objects for which the Government was established, and that local interests, local passions, or prejudices, incited and fostered by individuals for sinister purposes, would lead to acts of aggression and injustice by one State upon the rights of another, which would ultimately terminate in violence and force, unless there was a common arbiter between them, armed with power enough to protect and guard the rights of all, by appropriate laws, to be carried into execution peacefully by its judicial tribunals." Maintaining this postulate of the Constitution, he found in it nothing in derogation of the dignity of sovereign States which had entered the compact of the Union; on the contrary, he said, "the highest honor of sovereignty is untarnished faith." In this eloquent and uncompromising utterance, upholding the authority of the court at a time of extreme passion and agitation, Chief Justice Taney discharged unflinchingly the supreme duty of his office.

In this hour of tribute by those who prize the happy traditions of this community I can do no better than to recall the appraisal of an associate of the Chief Justice, who in the peculiar intimacy of the labors of the court knew the quality of Taney's work better than others, whether friends or critics. I quote, not the words of a political supporter, but the estimate of Justice Benjamin R. Curtis, of Massachusetts, one of the ablest men who had sat upon the bench and one who had strongly dissented from the decision of the Chief Justice in the case of Dred Scott. Said Justice Curtis in his remarks on the death of Taney:

"When I first knew him he was master of all that peculiar jurisprudence which it is the special province of the courts of the United States to administer and apply. His skill in applying it was of the highest order. His power of subtle analysis exceeded that of any man I ever knew, a power not without its dangers to a judge as well as to a lawyer, but in his case it was balanced and checked by excellent common sense and by great experience in practical business, both public and private. * * * For it is certainly true, and I am happy to be able to bear direct testimony to it, that the surpassing ability of the Chief Justice and all his great qualities of character and mind were more fully and constantly exhibited in the consultation room, while presiding over and assisting the deliberation of his brethren, than the public knew or can ever justly appreciate. There his dignity, his love of order, his gentleness, his caution, his accuracy, his discrimination were of incalculable importance. The real intrinsic character of the tribunal was greatly influenced by them, and always for the better. * * * He was as absolutely free from the slightest trace of vanity and self-conceit as any man I ever knew. * * * The preservation of the harmony of the members of the court and of their good will to himself was always in his mind."

With the passing of the year and the softening of old asperities the arduous service nobly rendered by Roger Brooke Taney has received its fitting recognition. He bore his wounds with the fortitude of an invincible spirit. He was a great Chief Justice.

LETTER OF FORMER SENATOR JOSEPH I. FRANCE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from former Senator Joseph I. France.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1932.

HERBERT HOOVER, Esq.,
Executive Office, Washington, D. C.

SIR: At the last moment for doing so you filed your name in Maryland as a candidate for the Presidency against me. An organization of Federal officeholders, their dependents and friends, were able to secure for you about 26,000 votes. I make no complaint because you caught me off my guard with but a few days to campaign without any organization, and as a result I was unable to secure as many votes as yourself, so the 19 votes from Maryland will be pledged by law to and should vote for you at the Republican National Convention.

If you had lost in the presidential preference primary in Maryland, as you have lost by defeat or your failure to file as a candidate in the other States having presidential primary laws, would you have claimed the delegates from Maryland, as you are now claiming, if reports are correct, the delegates from North Dakota, Illinois, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, West Virginia, and Oregon?

Of course, it is possible that you are not claiming any of the 231 delegates from these primary States where I shall have won over you. While you did not file in North Dakota, Illinois, Nebraska, and Pennsylvania, under the laws of these States voters can, and sometimes do, write upon the ballot the name of an unfiled popular candidate. In North Dakota very few, if any, wrote your name upon the ballot, and the same was true in Illinois and Pennsylvania. In Nebraska, where Federal officeholders evidently were active in your behalf, 13,934 voters wrote your name upon the ballot, but I received 40,481 votes, defeating you nearly 3 to 1. Yet I had no opportunity to make a campaign in Nebraska, and I had no organization. I received more than twice as many votes in Philadelphia alone as you received in the whole State of Maryland. I have received the tabulated vote from but one precinct in Pennsylvania, and the result was 51 votes for me and 8 for yourself. A prominent press service after the primary failed to report my victory over you in Pennsylvania but brazenly asserted that the delegates from that State would be for you, in spite of the fact that a distinguished member of the Pennsylvania delegation had previously declared that the Pennsylvania delegation would be unpledged, and, in the face of the fact, subsequent to that statement, I had carried the presidential primaries.

My sense of personal honor and duty to uphold the laws of the States would cause me to resent and repudiate any statement to the effect that the delegates from Maryland now pledged to you would vote for my nomination at Chicago in violation of law and the directing votes of the people, even though the delegates desired to do so. And yet your methods in Maryland were not above criticism, if not beyond the law.

I would remind you that your chief duty, as President, as prescribed by the Constitution, is to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." I call upon you now to repudiate the allegations that you and your supporters will seek to permit, influence, or coerce delegates, to the number of 231, from the aforesaid States, having primary laws, who shall be pledged to me, to vote for your nomination.

You must repudiate or deny these reports that your supporters intend to secure votes at the convention contrary to law, or present to the American people the spectacle of a Chief Magistrate who sets himself above the mandates of the Constitution of the United States, the statutes of sovereign States, and the expressed will of the people.

While there can be, under the Constitution, no prison penalties for delegates to a political convention who fail to obey the direction of the primary laws, there are drastic penalties for men who enter into a conspiracy to do an illegal act, or even to accomplish a legal end by illegal methods.

One's duty to his country and the integrity of its laws should urge him to seek the indictment of any group of men who might seem to be implicated in such a conspiracy to evade or violate the election laws of seven of the States of the Union. No man can become so exalted in this Republic as not to be amenable to its laws.

But this question involves a greater issue. I maintain that the present afflictions and distress of our country are due to an absolutely pernicious, false, and destructive doctrine, to which you have heretofore subscribed, and apparently still do, namely, that men may set aside law when their own plans and ambitions or the exigencies of the situation seem to demand such action.

You were one of a group, to which I was absolutely opposed, which held that in time of war the Constitution could be suspended and that under the war power officials of the Federal Government may defy the constitutional mandates and set aside its guaranties.

The Supreme Court in 1866, in Ex parte Milligan, had denounced such doctrine in the following words:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism."

The views which you held in 1917 as to the right of men to rape the Constitution when it suits them were still unchanged in April, 1924, as indicated by the quotation from a letter alleged to have been written by you to Congressman JOHN J. MCSWAIN on the military bill. I quote:

"I would also suggest that, from a legal point of view, a general clause should be added to the bill giving a blanket authority to the President to fix prices, wages, transportation charges, compensations, embargoes on imports and exports; to exercise the war powers of requisition under circumstances that 75 per cent of the estimated value may be paid and the balance determined by the courts in case of disagreement; suspend habeas corpus; and generally complete and absolute authority in all ramifications over the whole civilian life with the provision that he may delegate these authorities through these various agencies.

"War is an unhappy business and the great bulk of our ordinary safeguards of life must be forgotten, and the more evident it is that the whole Nation will be put in the storm and made to bear its share of the sacrifice the less likely we are to go to war."

Under your doctrine unscrupulous men could create a technical state of war, confiscate liberty and property, and set up tyranny. Any man holding such perverted views of our American system of government is unfit to hold any position of trust in this Republic.

You advocated the League of Nations and, when you were exercising an almost despotic power as Food Administrator as a part of the régime of Woodrow Wilson, you called upon the country to return a Democratic Congress to support President Wilson in his advocacy of this unconstitutional and iniquitous scheme to get us into an alliance with foreign empires. It is reported that you are still at work to get us into the league by the back door of the World Court. The absurdity and insincerity of any plan to form a World Court, in the absence of a codified system of law based upon the American doctrine that the prime function of all government is to preserve the "unalienable rights of men" against invasion by governments, must be apparent to every honest-minded man.

You once called the eighteenth amendment "a noble experiment," and since that time, resting upon your laurels with the "drys," with sly and reassuring winks and whispers from your followers to the "wets," you have evaded, compromised, or kept silent upon this issue, hoping to again secure a victory with the attempt to seek the highest office by the way of fraud, deceit, and dishonor. You have not shown the courage, as our Chief Executive of this Nation, to condemn, defend, or to enforce the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act.

Certainly the eighteenth amendment is one more of the lawless acts which have brought distress upon us.

I call your attention, sir, to the fact that, except yourself, every candidate for nomination at the coming conventions of the Republican and Democratic Parties has declared himself unequivocally on this prohibition issue in which the people of this country are to-day so vitally concerned. I, as a candidate for the Republican nomination at the Chicago convention, June 14, have made my position clear in favor of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. In the Democratic Party, Governor Roosevelt, of New York, former Governor Smith, of New York, and Governor Ritchie, of this State, and every other prominent candidate for the Democratic nomination, has made it clear where each of them stands on this great national issue.

You, Mr. Hoover, stand alone in failing to state in a straightforward manner your position on this prohibition issue. In the State of Maryland it is a question in which our people have a vital interest. In this, my State, 46,964 citizens voted for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment in the Literary Digest poll, while only 14,318 Maryland citizens voted for the retention of the prohibition law, a vote of 3 to 1 for repeal.

I ask you, therefore, to issue a statement as to how you stand upon this prohibition question. Failure on your part to make your position clear on this prohibition issue should, and I believe will, disqualify you from the right to ask the people of this country to support you for nomination in Chicago, June 14. I believe the people of these United States will not elect to the Presidency, at this critical time, any man who lacks the candor and the courage to state boldly where he stands upon this and every important issue of vital concern to the American people.

I might trace, if space permitted, our whole present distress to these and similar violations of laws and principles of legal and righteous American action. You, for example, have been an advocate of a policy which is a repudiation of a principle enunciated by George Washington, as a corollary of our American system, to "cultivate the friendship of all nations." Our international policies have been dictated by the considerations of European politics, not by sound American principles. Your attitude toward Russia, a great potential market for American goods, as I have pointed out since 1919, is stupid, reactionary, and indefensible.

I realized, at the close of the war, that a general international reconciliation and a common effort to overcome the loss and repair the devastation of war, were imperative.

But under your influence, in large part I must believe, we permitted an economic "war after war" to proceed in Europe while billions of American dollars were sent to Europe to save nations who would not save themselves by an abandonment of policies of retribution and vengeance.

Can it be possible that your whole failure is due to the fact that you are not grounded in the principles of our American system of government? Do you set yourself above the law? Do you believe in personal, not in legal government? Do you lack the courage which springs from convictions? For a lack of convictions you give us a pack of commissions.

I test your courage, candor, and honor by the following direct questions:

1. Do you concede to me the 231 delegates from the primary States where I won over you as I concede you the 19 votes from Maryland, and will you request these delegates to fulfill their moral and legal obligations to me and the people of their several States?

2. Do you still entertain the view that the mandates of the Constitution may, under certain conditions, be suspended, placing our liberty and property in jeopardy, at the mercy of autocratic officials?

3. Do you still believe in the League of Nations as you did when you were the faithful follower of Woodrow Wilson?

4. Do you still intend to play European politics or will you accept the admonitions of George Washington, cultivate the friendship of all nations, including Russia, and open up to American commerce the vast waiting markets of the world?

5. Will you state to the American people where you stand upon the eighteenth amendment, a most pressing problem of government?

6. Will you renounce your alleged purpose of getting us into the World Court and thus implicating us in the countless quarrels of the world?

There are other pertinent and pressing questions which I might put to you concerning your views and policies, but the limitations of a letter prevent a general discussion of your policies and failures.

You are at present a pathetic figure, exposed and without defense or defenders, if I may except your personal appointees, and even some of these have seemed unwilling to defend you in written or open discussion with me. Like their valiant chief, they retreat from every challenge. My purpose in opposing your nomination had its origin in the devotion which I feel for my country plunged, unnecessarily, into distress and peril by men who sought to direct the affairs of government in disregard and violation of sound and proven principles of constitutional action.

I believe we can have no return to general prosperity until we have a return to political morality

Will you dodge, evade, equivocate, and attempt again to be elected to the highest office through a campaign of intolerance, hypocrisy, lies, meanness, bigotry, and dishonor?

Your answers to my other questions, or your failure to answer, will be the answer to this one.

I believe nothing which you can say or leave unsaid can save you. A pauperized, Hooverized, and humiliated Nation will repudiate you at the first opportunity.

I am forwarding this letter to you by registered mail.

Yours truly,

JOSEPH IRWIN FRANCE.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, in order that the Senate may know what the amendment is, may I state that it is the amendment which I discussed on Saturday relative to a tax upon the selling price of stocks and bonds on the stock exchanges of the country. I shall not repeat the arguments which I made then but simply explain that the House provision, which provided for one-fourth of 1 per cent tax on the selling price, which is 25 cents on every $100, was stricken out by the Senate committee.

There has been some question as to whether that amount is too high, so I have offered an amendment to the House text, on page 274, in line 15, to strike out the word "fourth" and insert the word "eighth," so the tax would be one-eighth of 1 per cent instead of one-fourth of 1 per cent. One-eighth of 1 per cent is the amount which the brokers charge as a commission on all sales or purchases they make on the stock exchange.

There is a dispute as to how much revenue this will raise. When the bill was before the House it was estimated to raise $75,000,000 at one-fourth, which would mean $37,000,000 at one-eighth. When members of the stock exchange were before the Senate committee they said it would raise only $32,000,000 at one-fourth, which would be $16,000,000 at one-eighth. But whatever may be the amount, it seems to me it is a source of taxation that should not be disregarded when we are seeking sources that will not be burdensome to the American people.

Stock-exchange gambling is one of the things that has aroused the American people as few things have aroused them. It seems to me it is not unreasonable, but is a just and fair proposal that we tax them one-eighth of 1 per cent, the amount of the commission.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand the matter, what the Senator proposes is to reduce the amount of the tax?

Mr. DILL. I do; I propose to reduce it to one-half of what the House proposed. The House proposed a tax of one-fourth of a cent.

Mr. JONES. That will produce a smaller amount of revenue then?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The Senator proposes a tax on such stock transactions, but, as I understand, he says it is a smaller tax than that proposed by the House?

Mr. DILL. Yes; but owing to the fact that the bill increases the charge for each transfer of each share of stock from 2 cents to 4 cents, some think that to make the rate in this instance one-fourth of 1 cent would be so heavy that it would unduly burden the stock-exchange business. So in order that that objection might be met I offer the amendment to make the rate one-eighth of 1 per cent, or one-half of the tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent proposed by the House.

Mr JONES. I understood it that way, but I thought that was really contrary to the Senator's suggestion that these transactions should bear a pretty good tax?

Mr. DILL. I think they should.

Mr. JONES. That is one reason why I am inclined not to support the Senator's amendment.

Mr. DILL. I am raising the Senate rate, but I am decreasing the rate of the House bill.

Mr. JONES. Is the Senator increasing the rate provided by the Senate bill?

Mr. DILL. I am raising the rate in the Senate bill one-eighth of 1 per cent on the sales price of the stock transferred.

Mr. JONES. The Senator's amendment, then, increases the rate in the Senate bill?

Mr. DILL. Yes; and it will raise anywhere from $15,000,000 to $35,000,000 of revenue, depending on who is right in the estimates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has just answered the question I was about to ask him, namely, how much revenue would be derived.

Mr. DILL. The amendment proposed by me increases the tax levied by the Senate committee bill, but it is less than the tax levied by the House provision.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a good many Senators were not here when this question was discussed on Saturday. I want to state as briefly as I can what the objections are to the amendment of the Senator from Washington. At the present time the Federal Government taxes all transfers of stock at the rate of 2 cents on each $100 of par value, or, if there is no par value, then the par of each share is assumed to be $100. The State of New York, in which most of these transactions take place, had a similar tax, but a few months ago it doubled that tax and now charges 4 cents on each $100 par value. So to-day these transactions are carrying a burden of 6 cents on each $100 of par value. The Senate Finance Committee has recommended that the Federal tax be doubled, that is, raised from the present 2 cents to a new tax of 4 cents, which will make a double burden carried by such transaction of 8 cents on each $100 par value.

The Senator from Washington and the House of Representatives each proposed a tax based, not upon par value which is readily ascertainable from the face of the stock certificate, but based upon the price for which the stock is sold. The objections to that are two-fold. First, on apparently credible testimony, given to us in considerable volume, we came to the conclusion that such a tax, if it were practicable, would defeat its own purpose because it was much more than the traffic could bear. It would, instead of taxing the present volume of sales, have the effect of very much diminishing the present volume of sales, and in the long run we would get much less out of that supposedly high tax than we would out of the rather stiff but still somewhat moderate tax recommended by the committee. That is one objection, that it imposes a greater tax than the traffic would bear, and there would be no traffic.

The second objection goes to the practicability of the tax. As everyone knows, a stock certificate can be signed in blank, the signatures being on the back of it but the name of the assignee being left blank, and if it is the certificate of a known banking or brokerage house and the signature on the back of the assignment is guaranteed by some bank or known brokerage house that certificate will circulate around in New York perhaps for a year, passing through a hundred different hands. If the stock is not a dividend-paying stock, there is no need of transferring it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Is not the proposed tax in this bill open to identically that same objection?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. WHEELER. How is that condition remedied by the provisions of the bill?

Mr. REED. That is what I wanted to explain. The tax put on by the Finance Committee is based on the par value of the stock which is known by the transfer agent, which is known by everybody who reads the certificate, and consequently the purchaser of the stock knows exactly how much stamp tax the seller ought to put on when he delivers the certificate to consummate the sale.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but suppose I have a certificate and transfer it to the Senator and it does not go through the stock exchange, is it necessary to pay the tax each time the certificate is passed on?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. How is that going to be reached any more than in the other instance?

Mr. REED. It is reached because the tax is paid by the seller; it is to buyer's interest to see that it is paid, and he will not accept delivery until it is paid.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but if the stock is indorsed in blank, I can pass it on to the Senator and he can pass it on to somebody else in a private transaction.

Mr. REED. Certainly; but I will not take it from the Senator until the necessary stamps are attached.

Mr. WHEELER. But so long as the first tax is paid the purchaser is not going to be interested, if it is his purpose to beat the tax; and the other tax can be beaten in exactly the same way.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. WHEELER. There is not any question about it at all. Does the Senator mean to tell me that when somebody wants to beat the tax he can not indorse the certificate in blank and then, one tax having been paid, the certificate can not be passed on privately from one person to another? It is perfectly good upon its face so long as it has paid the first tax.

Mr. REED. The Senator has not allowed me to finish. If he will hear me to the end I know he will see the point I am trying to make. The tax imposed by the present law can not be escaped because every time a certificate is presented for transfer the transfer agent knows to a penny what the tax must be, because it is based on par value and the transfer agent will not make the transfer until the proper tax is put on.

Now, under the proposal of the House bill——

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Wait a minute, please—under the proposal of the House bill and under the proposal of the Senator from Washington the tax would be based on the sale price; a certificate may be presented for transfer with the assignment dated six months ago, and no living human being except the intimate parties to the transaction can know what the sale price was.

Mr. WHEELER. I——

Mr. REED. Let me finish; I am just about through. The transfer agent, therefore, has no means of checking up on the amount of the tax that should be paid to the Government, and either must disregard it or must make the transfer at his peril. We can not reasonably expect the transfer agent to know what that sale price was, and we have not provided in the bill any method of making that sure for the transfer agent or for the Government tax agent, who would be just as much in the dark as would be the transfer agent. If somebody should present a certificate for United States Steel stock with the assignment dated perhaps a year ago, or, to take a less extreme case, three months ago, the transfer agent could not tell and the Treasury could not tell and nobody could tell what the sale price of that certificate was.

Mr. WHEELER. Now, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I submit that the Senator has not cleared up the situation at all, so far as the certificate of stock that is indorsed in blank is concerned. I have a certificate for a hundred shares of United States Steel; I indorse it, and then my signature is guaranteed—or it is not necessary that it be guaranteed if it is witnessed by somebody—and that certificate of stock then passes on to the Senator from New York. It has the stamps on it at the time it is transferred, but it can be passed on privately after that ten times or fifty times between individuals, and the only time that the tax is going to be paid is when it is actually transferred on the books; the only time the Government will get a tax upon the sale of the certificate is when it is sold upon the stock exchange.

Mr. REED. We do not need to prophesy about it, because these trades have been made by the million ever since this tax was first put on; and it does not matter how many times the certificate is passed around under the present system no broker will accept it from one in furtherance of a purchase he has made unless a memorandum of sale bears the stamps.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, no broker probably will, but I am talking about transfers that are passed on from person to person and do not go through brokers' offices. In the same way a tax can be put on every sale, every transaction, just as a tax is put upon every sale that is made upon the stock market. A charge can be imposed just as the stock broker charges a commission. In other words, a tax can be put on every sale that is made upon the stock exchange or made through some brokerage office. Say that the commission is 12½ cents; we can put a tax on of 12½ cents, and have brokerage house collect it.

Mr. REED. I do not think there is very much use in my persisting, because I do not seem to be making any headway with the explanation. When the Government comes to fix the tax on the sale price it is an outsider to the transaction and can not fix the tax with the same readiness and accuracy that the broker can fix his commission, because he is a party to the deal and knows exactly on what basis to calculate his commission.

Mr. WHEELER. Then the Senator is saying that the broker at the same time he makes the sale can not collect the money for the tax that has been levied by the Government.

Mr. REED. Nobody proposes to make the broker the collecting agency of this tax.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Senator's argument comes down to this, that this tax should not be imposed because it will not be collected.

Mr. REED. That is one reason.

Mr. DILL. If that is true, then it will not do any harm. The stock exchange is opposed to it because it knows it will be collected.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the provision beginning in line 10, on page 276, which has been stricken out by the Senate committee, which amendment I shall ask to have disagreed to if my amendment shall be adopted. That provision reads:

> (b) The tax provided for in subsection (a) shall be imposed on all sales, agreements to sell, and/or memoranda of sale or delivery consummated entirely within the United States or between citizens or residents of the United States; and in addition—

And so forth.

There is a specific provision to reach the very thing the Senator is talking about. It seems to me a ridiculous argument to oppose this tax on the theory that it can not all be collected.

Mr. REED. If it is not obvious to the Senator, I do not believe I can make it obvious to him.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I want to say that when the Finance Committee gave consideration to this transfer tax, both as to stocks and bonds, it was quite conclusive that there would be great difficulty in collecting it. I think it was more because of the difficulty in collection than for any other reason that the committee eliminated it.

I submit, however, that the collection of this tax is not more difficult, in my judgment, in fact, not nearly so difficult as to attempt to collect a general sales tax from the many more items involved in such a tax as to which we will have to rely upon the manufacturer for the purpose of computing it. That would be more difficult of administration than having to rely upon the broker or banker who sells or transfers stock for the purpose of seeing that proper stamps are applied.

The amendment proposed will raise considerable additional revenue, and I believe, in view of the fact that one-fourth of 1 per cent has been reduced to one-eighth per cent by the amendment, that the amendment might properly be adopted and let the Government collect what it can through the same source through which we would have to collect the sales tax if one were imposed, and that is the agency which does the business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to the House text, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is absent. Therefore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I do not know how he would vote, and I am unable to secure a transfer, so I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HAYDEN. My colleague the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. If my colleague were present, he would vote against the amendment, and the Senator from Iowa would vote in favor of it.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is absent from the city. If he were present, he would vote "yea" on this question. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

Mr. LOGAN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GLENN. I find that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] has a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are necessarily out of the city.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. DILL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. SMOOT. Is this an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is an amendment to the stock-transfer provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the amendment I am proposing is to this provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It comes in at a later point, following the amendment which is now before the Senate.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It qualifies one of the provisions of the amendment proposed by the committee; so it seems to me that this is the proper moment for the consideration of the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate. The Chair still thinks the amendment is not in order until the present committee amendment has been disposed of.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Florida offers an amendment, on page 274, line 23, after the word "loaned," to strike out the colon and add:

But the tax upon stock loaned for the purpose of protecting short selling shall be 1 cent on each share so loaned or transferred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the information of the Senator from Florida, the Chair will state that the Senate is now dealing with the amendment contained in lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, on page 274, whereas the Senator's amendment is not proposed to be added until we come to line 23.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will offer the amendment later, then, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 274, line 21, it is proposed to strike out the word "deposited" and insert "deposited, nor upon mere loans of stock," so as to read:

Nor upon the delivery or transfer for such purpose of certificates so deposited, nor upon mere loans of stock—

And so forth.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] made some comment on this particular provision of the amendment now under consideration a few days ago. I desire to inquire if he has in mind offering any amendment with regard to it.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not know to what the Senator refers, unless it be the matter of the low-priced stocks on the exchanges.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the matter of proposed loans of stock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Washington to say that if the amendment which he proposed, and which was just voted upon, was carried, he intended to offer another amendment later.

Mr. DILL. I did intend to. Of course, the truth of the matter is that when we attempt to lay a tax on the stock exchange that will be effective to stop gambling, we can not get a majority of the United States Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Anyway, we should test it out. I move to amend by striking from the amendment proposed by the committee the language "nor upon mere loans of stock."

Mr. President, it is, in my opinion, quite justifiable to exclude from the operation of this tax stock that is put up as collateral. That is not really sales stock; but under all ordinary circumstances a loan of stock to make good a short sale is a sale of that stock. Of course, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] the other day pointed out a state of circumstances under which a loan of stock might be very properly made in aid of perfectly legitimate transactions; but it is no secret at all that the borrowing of stock, so called, is in practically every instance an incident of a short sale. Indeed, under the rules of the exchange a short sale can not be accomplished without a loan, so called, of stock. The speculator proposes to sell short. He proposes to sell in the expectation that the price of the stock is going to fall. He then borrows from his broker the stock so as to make the sale, to be returned at some time in the future when the broker calls for it, when the trader expects to get it at a lower price, and thus make a profit.

He must, however, the next day after offering upon the exchange to sell the stock, deliver the stock, and he has not the stock, so he borrows it of his broker, and in all reasonable probability that broker borrows it of some other broker, and actually delivers the stock. So that eventually he returns not that stock at all. A loan would contemplate the redelivery of the very stock which is loaned, but nothing of the kind takes place at all. If it is to be returned at all—and in all reasonable probability it will not be returned—he will be obliged to go out into the market and buy some other stock, not the particular stock that was used in the transaction. So that the loan of stock under those circumstances is actually a sale of stock, because the trader buys the stock in effect from his broker to make good a sale he offers to make upon the exchange.

I can see no reason at all for excluding from the operation of the tax a loan of stock, so called, and making the tax effective against a straight sale of stock. That is really what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair suggest to the Senator from Montana that the purpose he has in mind may be secured by a rejection of the committee amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not desire to exclude the word "deposited," because that is perfectly proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate rejects the amendment, the word "deposited" in point of fact will not be stricken out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Chair is quite right. I accept the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the testimony before the committee was such that I think many members of the committee, if not a majority of the committee, came to the conclusion that the loaning of stock is essential to the carrying out of many legitimate transactions, such as a sale of stock to those living at a distance from the stock exchange. In other words, if a person living anywhere in the State of Montana, or in Utah, or any long distance from the stock exchange, desired to purchase stock or sell stock wherever he held it, he could not get his stock certificate there in time perhaps to sell upon a certain day, and yet the stock broker would be authorized to sell it. That stock broker, in order to sell the stock upon the day when the trader desired to have the sale of the stock take place, borrows the stock to take the place of the stock that is on the way, and as soon as the stock is received, he then delivers the stock borrowed back to the one from whom he borrowed it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Who made that explanation?

Mr. SMOOT. Who made it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Treasury Department made it before the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From whose testimony does the Senator read about the matter?

Mr. SMOOT. I am reading now from the report of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But upon whose testimony is this report of the committee founded?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the testimony here, but I remember very well that Mr. Whitney came before the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me ask the Senator whether the committee had the explanation that really the loan of stock is a necessary incident of every short sale of stock?

Mr. SMOOT. Not of every short sale, but——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No, no; I understand that explanation was made. I want to know from the Senator whether the other explanation was made.

Mr. SMOOT. As to the short sale?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not involved in this amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But was it explained to the committee, if explanation was necessary, that a borrowing of stock is a necessary incident of every short sale?

Mr. SMOOT. In many cases, I will say, that is true, but this is as to legitimate sales.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not asking what the truth is; I am asking whether that explanation was made to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. More than likely it was.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Whitney testified before the committee, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. REED. May I ask who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator bear with me a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. I merely wish to ask a question.

Mr. REED. I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Montana.

The mechanics of a short sale were apparently understood by the members of the Finance Committee. They were also explained to the members by Mr. Whitney, the president of the New York Stock Exchange. I do not think there is very much doubt in anybody's mind about what takes place when a short sale is made.

The committee was ready enough, I think, to tax short selling if it could reach short selling by itself; but we discovered that there were so many transactions entirely legitimate that would be penalized by any tax upon the borrowing of stock that the committee came to the conclusion that it would be unwise to impose such a tax.

For example, it is not true that every short sale entails a borrowing of stock. It entails the borrowing of stock only in case the sale is left open; the seller remains short overnight. There are tens of thousands of short sales made which are covered the day they are made, and such a short sale does not entail borrowing at all, and a tax would not begin to reach such transactions.

On the other hand, whenever a man is sick and can not get to his safe-deposit box and wants to sell some stock, or when he is on a vacation and wants to sell some stock which he has in his box back at home, he sells the stock on order through his broker. He can not get there to make delivery. If the sale is made on the New York Stock Exchange, the delivery has to take place by 2.15 o'clock the following afternoon. So the broker is driven to borrow the stock to carry out that perfectly legitimate sale, which is not a short sale.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, then what is the difference between that and a purchase of stock from the broker? What is the difference between the trader purchasing the stock from his broker and borrowing the stock from his broker? He is not in a situation to carry out the transaction he would like to carry out, but the broker is, so he really buys the stock from the broker and he expects to return that stock to the broker in the course of time. He really buys the stock from the broker instead of borrowing it from him.

Mr. REED. If the Senator wants to find every borrowing on collateral as a succession of two sales, of course that is what it becomes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I expressly disclaim that. Here is a man with stock in his safe, and he wants to borrow on it. He goes and delivers it as collateral. That ought not to be taxed, and I do not intend that it shall be. The bill would not tax it. That is excluded entirely. But when he makes a short sale, he actually, it is said, borrows the stock from his broker; but, as a matter of fact, he buys it from his broker.

Mr. REED. It is certainly a borrowing when the borrower is bound to return the identical thing borrowed or its equivalent. That is a loan.

Under the rules of the New York Stock Exchange delivery must always be made by 15 minutes after 2 o'clock of the day following a sale. It is obviously impossible for a security holder living more than 24 hours from New York to sell there on telegraphic order and complete the transaction by 2.15 of the following day. One result, therefore, of the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Montana would be to make it cost every American who lives more than 24 hours from New York twice as much as it costs a New Yorker to perform the same action. We would be putting a penalty upon the country; we would be giving a further advantage to the man who lives in New York City. We would let the New Yorker perform exactly the same act performed by the man living at a distance for just one-half the cost. It did not seem to the committee that that would be fair.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, it is just on that point that I rose to make an observation, and I direct the attention of the Senator from Montana to what I am about to say.

The requirement that the delivery be made by 2.15 on the day following a transaction is a rule of the New York Stock Exchange. It is a rule, of course, which may be modified or changed at any time. The exchange could very well lengthen the time for the actual delivery of the stock in any bona fide transaction. The Senator will find on inquiry that the stock exchanges in nearly every other country allow a much longer time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is a week in London.

Mr. GEORGE. I believe that it would make for the stability of the stock exchange itself, that it would tend to discourage short selling, that it would tend to prevent the pure speculation which has been so often the basis of complaint in the two years last past, if a longer period of time were actually permitted for the delivery of stock.

The Senator, I think, can see at a glance that if the stock can be immediately or almost immediately delivered, there is more inducement to enter into these speculative transactions. It so seems to me.

When Mr. Whitney, the president of the New York Stock Exchange, was before the committee, I asked him whether the exchange could not allow three days for actual delivery, or four days, and Mr. Whitney said that the exchange could, but that the exchange believed that it would be exceedingly hazardous, if not disastrous, to lengthen the time for the delivery after sale.

He had in mind, however, the stock market in its present condition, and short selling, beyond all doubt, is somewhat responsible, at least in some measure responsible, for the condition in which the stock exchange has found itself in the last two years, especially during the last several months.

I think it must be conceded, while there are those who take the opposite view of it, that short selling has few, if any, virtues. I believe that the consensus of opinion is that it is an evil. It is certainly an evil when the country faces a condition such as we are now going through. If the New York Stock Exchange itself should see fit to base the time for delivery upon the distance away from the market of the particular stock, lengthen it in the case of some one actually holding the stock in San Francisco, let us say, and who wished to sell it, and who did order a sale of it on the exchange, it would tend for greater stability, rather than the present speculative tendency and present disposition to engage in short selling on the exchange.

I rose merely to make that statement, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as I understand, it is contemplated, as explained by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the present practice is to accommodate those who are too far away to sell and deliver the identical stock offered for sale and ultimately to be delivered.

I think all of us agree that fixing the next day at 15 minutes after 2 as the limit for the delivery of a stock sold has brought about a system of marginal trading, under which thousands sell stock they never own, but take a gambler's chance on being able to deliver the stock, or their broker being able to buy it, they assuming responsibility for the margin up or down. It is not a transfer of stock. They never intend to actually buy it or sell it, but they simply put an order with their brokers, for instance, to sell so many shares, and it is understood that they are to settle whatever margin there may be. The broker takes the stock as collateral. It is a pure gamble as to whether it will go up or down. When settlement day comes there is no stock delivered, but the individual who sells short is the one that pays. It is simply a gamble on margin, as it is termed. The party who buys or sells it never delivers the stock and never owns any piece of it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what the Senator is doing is describing a transaction in a bucket shop.

Mr. SMITH. No; on a stock exchange.

Mr. REED. Of course, a tax on those sales would not touch the bucket shops at all.

Mr. SMITH. It is not a matter of the bucket shops. The Senator knows that thousands of people throughout the country order their brokers to buy or sell on the stock exchange certain given stocks, and they are legitimate transactions. If the broker can borrow the stock, he holds it as collateral against the individual who buys or sells, and the individual has to make up the difference between the purchase price and the rise or drop. If he loses, he pays the balance of the margin and the transfer is made by the broker without him participating whatsoever.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the committee reaches only a very limited number of short sales. It reaches only those short sales so characterized by the stock exchange, but those are not the only short sales. All of the certificates that are loaned may be used for speculative purposes and not investment purposes. It has been disclosed before the Committee on Banking and Currency that loaned stock is not characterized on the stock exchange as a short sale. Mr. Whitney testified, giving illustrations such as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has given, but in no case has any specific instance been brought to the attention of the Committee on Banking and Currency that any of the sales of loaned stocks were other than speculative stocks. They are essentially speculative stocks.

There is another type of short selling which the stock exchange does not regard as short selling. That is the type of short sale which involves a short position for one day only, where a sale is made early in the session on the exchange and the covering movement is made before the close of the market. That is essentially a short sale, but not so characterized by the stock exchange, nor is that type of sale reached by the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee.

There is another type of short selling that is not reached by the committee amendment, and that is the type of short selling which is popularly characterized as a "sale against the box." A sale against the box is an operation which involves a position in which the seller actually owns the stock, but goes short on it on a margin account with his broker, or with a brokerage office, where at the beginning of the operation in the morning session the seller is actually short of the stock on the margin account, and at the end of the operation the seller has to cover his short sale or his commitment. That is a type of short selling that is not covered by the amendment proposed by the committee.

I do not know whether we can reach all of the different types of selling even though they are essentially short sales, but as has been proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] we could reach all of that type of short selling where loaned stocks are involved in the operation. I think I state the fact accurately when I say that not one single specific instance has been brought to the attention of the Committee on Banking and Currency by Mr. Whitney or any broker where loaned stock has been used for any other purpose than a speculative purpose, and not for investment purposes.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to an interesting news item sent out on Saturday last by the United Press reading as follows:

For the second time within a year a 10 per cent reduction in salaries was announced by the Aluminum Co. of America, a Mellon interest, to-day. The new wage cut, affecting all employees of the company and its subsidiaries, will become effective June 1. The first reduction was made last September. Officials said the action had been considered for several weeks, but had been delayed until it became necessary as an economy measure.

Mr. President, on May 5, 1931, Mr. Mellon, then Secretary of the Treasury, made an address before the Congress of International Commerce in which he stated:

In this country there has been a concerted and determined effort on the part of both Government and business not only to prevent any reduction in wages but to keep the maximum number of men employed and thereby to increase consumption.

It must be remembered that the all-important factor is purchasing power, and purchasing power, in so far as America is concerned, is dependent to a great extent on the standard of living which obtains in this country. That standard of living must be maintained at all costs, and certainly the present is no time to undertake drastic and doubtful experiments which may even conceivably result in breaking down the standard of living to which we have become accustomed.

That was Mr. Mellon's statement on May 5 of last year. On October 1 last a 10 per cent reduction in wages of all employees of the Aluminum Co. of America went into effect, and, as we learn now from the daily press, another reduction of 10 per cent will become effective on the 1st of June.

I think under these conditions it becomes pertinent to call to the attention of the Senate an address made by Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, the American ambassador to Great Britain, at the London Mansion House on the 6th day of the present month. I shall not read the entire article, which was published in the London Daily Telegraph on the following day, Saturday, May 7, but I shall ask to have it printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the London Daily Telegraph, May 7, 1932]

MR. MELLON ON AMERICA'S EFFORT—SETTING ITS HOUSE IN ORDER—PUBLIC CREDIT TO BE PROTECTED—BANKING STRUCTURE SOUND

Mr. Andrew Mellon, the American ambassador, was entertained at luncheon yesterday at the Mansion House by the lord mayor. A distinguished company, representative of the city, was present to meet his excellency.

The lord mayor, in proposing the health of his guest, said the leading bankers, merchants, and citizens of London welcomed that opportunity of greeting the American Ambassador.

"There is," added the lord mayor, turning to Mr. Mellon, "a special reason why I should give you an opportunity of meeting the leading financiers of the city. You have through your life been intimately associated with finance and commerce in the United States, even before you assumed the office, 11 years ago, of Secretary of the United States Treasury.

"You have arrived in this country at a time when the whole world is confronted with the greatest financial and economic problems that have arisen since the termination of the war. I can only express the hope that our two countries will continue to work whole-heartedly together, as they have done in the past, to mitigate distress and promote the advance of civilization throughout the world." [Cheers.]

MR. MELLON'S FAITH

Mr. Mellon, in the course of his reply, said:

"I was in America last autumn when England went off the gold standard, when a general election hung over the country, and when you faced other difficulties which to the outside world seemed almost insuperable.

"On all sides I heard dire predictions of what would happen; but knowing the steadiness, courage, and real capacity of the British people, I never for one moment doubted that you would surmount your difficulties by rising to the occasion, as you subsequently did, and as England alway does in times of great emergency. One must have faith in the British people and not be misled by events, and so it is as regards America also.

"You read in the papers over here that our Congress is having difficulty in balancing the Budget, and one is apt to get the impression that there is a lack of will on the part of either Congress or the country, whereas the very opposite is the case. The country has determined that the Government shall set its own house in order, and that the public credit shall be protected at all costs. The confusion that you read of in Congress is merely as to the ways and means of doing this, and is almost inevitable under our system of framing revenue legislation.

NEW TAX LEVY

"The important thing to remember is that the American Congress is seeking means to levy over a billion dollars of new taxes, and that this is not an easy thing for any legislative body to do, especially on the eve of a general election and in the face of depressed business conditions.

"There is a very clear understanding, however, of what should and must be done not only on the part of the leaders of both parties in Congress but of the President, who has shown leadership of the highest order in submitting to Congress a program of legislation, most of which has been enacted, and all of which is designed to strengthen the credit structure and to restore confidence.

"The great banks of America, corresponding to your great institutions here, have weathered the storm remarkably well, and the banking structure itself, with the vast resources and steadying influence of the Federal reserve system in the background, has shown no serious impairment either in resources or stability.

ORDERLY DEFLATION

"There is much that I would like to say as to the relief work for the unemployed which is being carried on cheerfully and effectively in thousands of communities throughout the United States, and also the way in which organized labor, farmers, and every section of the population have accepted cuts in wages, lower commodity prices, and a general deflation of values without precedent in the history of the world.

"Deflation in America is proceeding calmly and in an orderly way, without strikes or riots or any of the violence that in times past have accompanied such drastic readjustments in the Nation's economic life.

"A great and patriotic American, who lived much in England and loved this country, once said to a compatriot, 'Never sell America short.' I would reiterate now what Mr. Morgan said then, and I would apply it to England no less than to my own country.

"None of us has any means of knowing when or how we shall emerge from the valley of depression in which the world is now traveling. But I do know that, as in the past, the day will come when we shall find ourselves on a more solid economic foundation and the onward march of progress will be resumed."

The Marquis of Reading proposed the toast of "the lord mayor," to which his lordship briefly replied. Among those present were:

Mr. Runciman (President of the Board of Trade), Viscount Astor, Lord Bethell, Lord Camrose, Lord Hyndley, Lord Marshall, Lord Revelstoke, Lord Wakefield.

Mr. F. C. Goodenough, Mr. E. C. Grenfell, M. P., Sir Auckland Geddes, Sir Arthur Maxwell, Mr. J. G. Latham (Attorney General for Australia), Sir Charles Addis, Sir George Beharrell, Mr. Lionel de Rothschild, Sir Harry McGowan, Sir Robert Kindersley, Mr. J. W. Beaumont Pease, Sir Louis Newton.

Sir Edmund Vestey, Sir John Hanbury-Williams, Sir Kynaston Studd, Sir Archibald Campbell, Sir Phené Neal, Mr. W. Lints Smith, Mr. J. G. Jarvie, Sir Frederick Bowring, Sir George McLaren Brown, Mr. S. Samuel, M. P., Sir Basel Blackett, Mr. C. D. Seligman, Sir George Penny, M. P., Sir Gilbert Garnsey, Wing-Cmdr. Louis Greig, Sir George Gillett, M. P., Sir James Bell, and Sir Alfred Lewis.

Mr. CUTTING. I wish to read just an excerpt or two:

Mr. Andrew Mellon was entertained at luncheon yesterday at the Mansion House by the lord mayor. A distinguished company, representative of the city, was present to meet his excellency.

I need hardly refer to the fact that by "the city" is meant that district of London which is concerned with business and financial interests. The audience which listened to Mr. Mellon was typical of the big banking and business world of London.

In the course of his remarks Mr. Mellon said—and this was a speech by a banker to fellow bankers:

The great banks of America, corresponding to your great institutions here, have weathered the storm remarkably well, and the banking structure itself, with the vast resources and steadying influence of the Federal reserve system in the background, has shown no serious impairment either in resources or stability.

Here the Daily Telegraph inserts a significant subhead, "Orderly Deflation."

I continue with Mr. Mellon's remarks:

There is much I would like to say as to the relief work for the unemployed, which is being carried on cheerfully and effectively in thousands of communities throughout the United States, and also the way in which organized labor, farmers, and every section of the population have accepted cuts in wages, lower commodity prices, and a general deflation of values without precedent in the history of the world.

Deflation in America is proceeding calmly and in an orderly way, without strikes or riots or any of the violence that in times past have accompanied such drastic readjustments in the Nation's economic life.

I shall not read the rest of the article, but will say, as anyone might assume without my saying it, that a large part of the address is devoted to the necessity for "balancing the Budget."

Mr. President, it seems to me that Mr. Mellon's public statements addressed to an audience which would naturally be most sympathetic with his views, together with the reduction in wages in his own company, are very significant of the attitude which is being urged upon us by so many statesmen, business men, and people of national repute that at all costs we must balance the Budget. I admit that by the persistence of this kind of propaganda we have reached a point where we have got to increase taxation more than would otherwise be justified in order to prevent the panic which might come upon the Nation if the hopes which the people entertain about the Budget should be dashed to the ground. That is not an indorsement of the policy of balancing the Budget. It is merely a dictate of common sense in view of the critical situation which has been stirred up by forces not under the control of the legislative branch of the Government.

Every Senator in this Chamber receives every day letters from hundreds of constituents begging that the Budget be balanced. I suppose there are not one-thousandth part of the people who write the letters who know what the Budget is, who could explain a system by which it might best be balanced, or who could say why, in a time of upheaval and crisis, the country's expenditures should by some mythical and mysterious process precisely balance its revenues. Yet the fact remains that the subject is of great concern to the average citizen.

In the consideration of the pending bill I have voted for taxes which I could not justify on any other ground except the necessity for satisfying this popular clamor, stirred up by interested parties, in favor of balancing the Budget.

If, instead of the phrase "balancing the Budget," we should substitute Mr. Mellon's phrase "orderly deflation," I think we should convey to the average citizen much more clearly what is going on in the United States at the present time.

Mr. President, the other night at 3 or 4 a. m. I was awakened to answer a long-distance telephone call from a gentleman who wanted to know how I stood on the revenue bill. Incidentally, he was a constituent of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, and no doubt reflected his views and those of the ambassador to Great Britain. He asked, "How do you stand on this revenue bill? Are you for it or against it?" I said, "This is a bill of 318 pages; I am for certain sections and against certain others. Is there any particular section to which you refer?" He said, "Yes; I refer to the section which balances the Budget." [Laughter.]

I have no great belief in capital punishment, and I have an unlimited belief in freedom of speech, but I think that if, at the moment, some one had asked me to vote for a bill establishing capital punishment for anyone who should mention "balancing the Budget," I should have been willing to vote for it.

I am going to read a short paragraph from the last issue of the New Republic.

Take a notebook and jot down the names of the officials, the speakers, and the writers who are now saying that the great need of the time is to balance the Budget, cut governmental expenditure, avoid bond issues for a large program of public works, prevent inflation, and protect the gold standard in the United States. Write down in another place the names of those who in many respects advise a contrary policy—like the economists who support Senator WAGNER'S public works bill, the engineers who advise similar programs, the economists of the University of Chicago who say that temporary, controlled inflation is the best way to bring about a future balance of the Budget. If, as we expect, the advice of the first group is followed, look at the economic situation six months from to-day, note the persons who gave this advice, and judge their competence accordingly. If many citizens had been making this check in previous years and months, we doubt if the deflationary group would now command much support. Barring unforeseen accidents, we strongly suspect that this little exercise in social science would discredit many of the leaders of opinion now dominant.

The rules of the Senate would probably prevent me from putting into the RECORD at this point the names of such of my brethren as have consistently supported the policy mentioned in the first sentence of that article. I shall confine myself to one or two outside the Senate.

Here is an article which appeared in an Associated Press dispatch from Chicago, dated May 28:

Congress was called upon in a statement to-day by Frank Knox, chairman of the President's Antihoarding Committee and publisher of the Chicago Daily News, to balance the Budget, cut Government costs by $250,000,000, enact a sales tax, provide $300,000,000 for early relief of distress, and go home.

It may be a surprise to certain Members of the Senate to find that Colonel Knox's program includes $300,000,000 for the relief of distress. That is the policy which the President about a year ago characterized as "playing politics with human misery." Even as lately as the time when the La Follette-Costigan bill was before the Senate every effort of the administration was put into play to prevent the enactment of such a program. Now, however, in accordance with the usual practice of the administration, after opposing with the utmost vigor a particular proposition, it surrenders; and before the end of the campaign we shall probably see the administration taking credit for having put across a direct Federal relief program in spite of the inertia and opposition of recalcitrant Members of the House and of the Senate.

I continue reading from the article:

Knox was instrumental in calling together a group of newspaper publishers recently for a conference with President Hoover.

Flailing the Democratic Members of Congress under Speaker GARNER'S leadership for advocating a $2,100,000,000 relief bill, Knox accused them of "resorting to the discreditable device of sugaring all sections with proffers of post offices and other substantial gifts from the Federal Treasury," by way of "preparing for the November harvest of votes."

PRAISES HOOVER PROGRAM

"In the past anxious months of congressional frivolity, the only leadership worthy of the name that has shown itself anywhere is that coming from the White House," said Knox. "The White House program is simplicity itself. It may be stated in three words—

Need I repeat them? "Balance the Budget!"

Mr. President, I do not intend to take a great deal of the Senate's time in discussing the President's statement about Speaker GARNER and his public works bill. I do not advocate that particular bill; and furthermore I believe the Speaker of the House is quite competent to defend himself. I do, however, want to call particular attention to the first words in the President's statement:

The urgent question to-day is the prompt balancing of the Budget. When that is accomplished I propose to support adequate measures for the relief of distress and unemployment.

In other words, the relief of our starving population, the restoration to them of opportunity for profitable employment is an entirely secondary consideration. First comes the grand statesmanlike ideal which appeals to us all—the ideal of balancing the Budget.

How long has the President felt that way? Can anyone find any utterance of his when he was running for office which dealt with the balancing of the Budget? Speaker GARNER in his reply has quoted several utterances of the President as to a public-works program. On September 17, 1928, for instance, the President said:

In my speech of acceptance I outlined our national program of prospective public works, including the development of water resources, public roads, and the construction of public buildings. In that speech I pointed out that these projects would require upwards of $1,000,000,000 within the next four years. I therefore recommended that, so far as practicable, this work should be carried on in such a way as to take up the slack of occasional unemployment.

Be it noted that in his reply to Speaker GARNER the President does not advocate any alternative program of public works; he is content with opposing the program laid down by the Speaker. There is no place apparently in his philosophy—and when I say "philosophy" of course I mean his philosophy of May 28, 1932—for public works of any kind.

The other day I referred to the program laid down in November, 1928, at the governors' conference in New Orleans by Governor Brewster, in the name of President-elect Hoover. I should like to emphasize the following quotation from the New York Times of November 22, 1928:

Mr. Hoover and Governor Brewster have exchanged views on the employment situation since election. Governor Brewster on November 10 sent Mr. Hoover a thousand-word summary of his address prepared for delivery at the conference of governors yesterday. On November 11 it was said Governor Brewster received a reply from Mr. Hoover authorizing him to present the program to the conference as being that of the President-elect.

This program, as Senators will remember, called for the creation of a reserve fund of $3,000,000,000 to forward a plan of public works in time of general unemployment. The Christian Science Monitor of May 14, 1929, made inquiry of the governors of the various States as to what they thought of Mr. Hoover's program. Thirty-seven of the forty-eight governors expressed themselves as being whole-heartedly in favor of the Hoover plan for public works in times of national unemployment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. When was it that the President put forth a program of public works?

Mr. CUTTING. Governor Brewster inaugurated this program at the meeting of governors which took place at New Orleans in November, 1928. The dispatch from the New York Times which I quoted is dated New Orleans, La., November 22.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator from New Mexico refer to President Hoover or to President Coolidge?

Mr. CUTTING. I refer to the then President-elect Hoover.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator mean to say that President Hoover advocated at one time a public-works program?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, Mr. President; up to that time he had always advocated it. He advocated it all the time when he was Secretary of Commerce. He was chairman of a commission appointed by President Harding to deal with the subject. Later, in February, 1923, he gave it his personal indorsement. I tried to show a short while ago that he recommended it in his campaign speeches. Here was the November, 1928, program for $3,000,000,000 to be placed in reserve as a fund for constructing public works in times of unemployment in the country.

Mr. CONNALLY. But there is a distinction; the President was not a candidate for reelection at that time, was he?

Mr. CUTTING. What the Senator says is quite pertinent. I have no doubt that in October, 1932, Mr. Hoover will revert to the policy which he propounded in the 1928 campaign, if that will satisfy the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Has the Senator from New Mexico examined the message of the President to Congress in December, 1930?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I have examined that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is there anything stated there about a program for public works?

Mr. CUTTING. The message to which the Senator refers is the one in which, when we attempted to afford some relief for the starving people of the South, the President said that Congress was "playing politics with human misery," is it not?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think that was it.

Mr. CUTTING. As far as I remember, that message contained no reference, except in a derogatory way, to public works other than those suggested in his $150,000,000 building program.

Mr. CONNALLY. I probably am thinking of the 1928 statement. I have a recollection that the President—either the President elect or the President hoping for reelection—had come out for public works on one or two occasions. I remember that we passed a largely increased program of public buildings since the President has been in office, with his approval.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not know whether I can be a guarantor of every statement that has come from the President. I know that recently he said something about a "continuation of such public works in aid of unemployment as do not place a strain on the taxpayer and do not necessitate Government borrowing." If the Senator can get any comfort from that statement, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that if the Senator from Texas were looking for comfort, he would not go to the White House.

Mr. CUTTING. As I was saying a short time ago, the governors of the country accepted this Hoover plan enthusiastically.

Governor Graves, of Alabama, said:

> The Hoover plan of pressing public work • • • is sound.

Governor Phillips, of Arizona, said:

> President Hoover has conceived the greatest plan I have ever heard of for averting economic crises and panics. The idea of taking up slack employment in times of depression should appeal alike to employer and employee, because the welfare of both depends upon quantity production.

Governor Emmerson, of Illinois, said:

> I am in hearty accord with President Hoover's expressed desire that public construction work may be organized, so far as practicable, in such a way as to take up the slack in occasional unemployment.

Governor Sampson, of Kentucky, said:

> Kentucky is enthusiastically for the Hoover-Brewster stabilization plan.

Governor Dillon, of New Mexico, stated:

> I have carefully read Herbert Hoover's proposed plan to undertake a larger-visioned development of our water resources; also his plan to take up the slack of unemployed labor through a national program of public works, including development of water resources, public roads, and construction of public buildings. New Mexico will do everything possible to cooperate with President Hoover in carrying out this plan, which appears to be just, sound, and workable, and whereby the Nation will reach a level of prosperity and contentment never before attained.

And so on throughout the States. The governors, the men elected by their people to represent them and to keep in touch with conditions in their respective States, agreed that this Hoover $3,000,000,000 public-works program was the greatest program ever devised to keep the people of the country from unemployment crises. How unfortunate that that plan was never adopted! And how unfortunate that the President of the United States is now under the impression that public works must be confined to such as he may consider "self-liquidating." "Self-liquidating"—another one of these magnificent, profound phrases which will perhaps go down in history together with that of "balancing the Budget"!

I spoke a little while ago of what Ambassador Mellon said about "orderly deflation." That is the policy of the administration in this country at the present time.

Why is there no interest, for instance, in the question of silver, a question so often raised by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]? Does anyone think it is on account of the merits or demerits of the issue? Does not everyone know that the opposition to discussing such questions, the thing which makes some people see red when they are mentioned, is that they would interfere with this regular, logical, sensible, calm, orderly program of deflation?

When it is proposed to pay off the ex-service men's adjusted-compensation certificates at the present time, rather than waiting until 1945 to do it, does anyone think that the opposition which is engendered is caused by any real belief that the ex-service men are not entitled to that payment? The fact of the matter, of course, is that the opposition comes from those who want to continue this deflation process—this process of cutting down the purchasing power of the mass of our people.

When these people talk about the hopelessness of trying to raise $5,000,000,000 for public works, whether by bond issue or in any other way, they do it because it will interfere with this general national program of deflation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. We have pending before us Senate bill 4412, which authorizes an appropriation of $125,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States to be immediately available to a corporation as paid-in surplus for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of that banking bill. My understanding is that the administration was in favor of appropriating something like $150,000,000 for this purpose, to be turned over to a private corporation composed of members of the Federal reserve banks. Nothing that I recall was said by the administration—perhaps the Senator recalls it—in opposition to that appropriation, and nothing was said to the effect that, if we appropriated it, it might keep us from balancing the Budget.

Mr. CUTTING. I have not studied the particular matter to which the Senator refers; but it seems to me that in many instances during this session of Congress we have voted, at the request of the administration, for so-called inflationary measures; but the inflation produced by those measures has always been what has been called "controlled inflation"; that is, inflation controlled by a certain body of people, the wise men of the country, the men who fell for Kreuger to the tune of $250,000,000, the men who sold billions of dollars worth of South American bonds to the citizenship of this country. Those men undoubtedly can be trusted to control the processes, both of inflation and of deflation, as their interest dictates. I have no doubt of that. Has the Senator?

Mr. WHEELER. No. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. This authorization of an appropriation of $125,000,000 is in the so-called Glass bill, S. 4412, which we had before us just a short time ago, and which is to follow this bill as the regular order. Among other things, it provides for $125,000,000 to be turned over to a banking corporation. Nothing was said when this bill was pending before the Congress to the effect that we were "playing politics with human misery" when we wanted to appropriate $125,000,000 for the banks. Nothing was said about a "swarm of lobbyists" when the banking group were down here lobbying for the passage of that provision. But let some one come here asking for an appropriation to take care of the people who are out of employment in this country, or let them come here asking for a soldiers' bonus, and then immediately the voice of the White House is raised, protesting to Congress against appropriations of that kind.

Mr. CUTTING. I hope the Senator sees the point I am trying to make—that, according to the opinions laid down by Ambassador Mellon, everything is going the best possible way. There is no trouble about deflation. It is going on quietly, without any criticism, without any disturbances, without any unruly attitude on the part of the population; and, of course, we want to continue that process, do we not?

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say that as I understand the meaning of the ambassador's statement, he is entirely in accord with the processes of deflation that are going on, and apparently approves of the deflation.

Mr. CUTTING. I shall be glad to read it again for the Senator's benefit:

> Deflation in America is proceeding calmly and in an orderly way, without strikes or riots or any of the violence that in times past have accompanied such drastic readjustments in the Nation's economic life.

The other day we heard a close friend of Mr. Mellon's, the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], explain to us that though the present revenue bill could have been better written by any 50 inhabitants of St. Elizabeths Hospital, yet the statesmen and bankers all over the world were insisting that we here must balance our Budget; and the Senator said, in conclusion:

> Just as soon as we show the will to balance the Budget, our troubles will be over.

"Our troubles will be over," Mr. President! The "orderly deflation" will be allowed to continue. People will continue to starve peaceably. The standard of living in this country will be lowered calmly, without riots, without violence of any kind. Thousands of people, perhaps, will commit suicide; but they will make no particular disturbance about it. A million homes may be broken up; but the breaking-up will not be accompanied by any of the excitement "that in times past have accomplished such drastic readjustments in the Nation's economic life."

I said the other day that the President's program seemed to leave no alternative to the unemployed except on the one hand revolt and on the other starvation. It must be very gratifying to all Members of the Senate and the rest of the citizenship of this country who read the remarks of our distinguished ambassador to Great Britain to learn that the people will starve; they will not revolt.

How can anyone stand here on the floor of the Senate and suggest that the main thing before the people of this country is a matter of bookkeeping, a matter of juggling accounts to show in some strange way that the expenditures for this year will exactly balance the receipts? No one can show it. No one knows. The estimates of the Treasury Department have been proved fallacious time and time again.

Why should a country which is sick expect necessarily to cure itself within the year? Why should not a country which is overburdened be permitted to draw on the future to the extent of obtaining the remedies which are going to bring to it recovery, or at least convalescence?

Mr. President, we spent $45,000,000,000 to win the war. Nobody said then, "You can not win the war. You must give up trying, because to do so would interfere with the balancing of the Budget." Our main objective was victory. If it could not have been obtained by the expenditure of $45,000,000,000, there was enough patriotism in this country to see that it was done by the expenditure of more money.

The present crisis, as the President has said repeatedly, is one which in many ways is more serious than war. If we could spend $45,000,000,000 in a process of consumption and destruction, can anyone say that the country can not spend $5,000,000,000 in a productive way to save us in the crisis which we are passing through?

I received to-day a copy of the Engineering News-Record, certainly an exceedingly conservative publication. It states that the American Society of Civil Engineers prefers some methof of expansion of public works other than a bond issue. I am inclined to disagree with them in that respect, Mr. President, but what they say is in other respects entirely pertinent. The paper says:

> There are worse things than expanding Federal public works, and worse things than issuing Government bonds (which was done without trepidation or harmful result during the war).

Referring to the President's statement of the other day, and speaking of "contradictions" and "half truths" and "misleading statements" which appeared in it, the Engineering News-Record states:

> Many other contradictions, half truths, or misleading statements appear in the President's letter, but they are overshadowed by the basic misappreciation just indicated. The erroneous charge that the society advocated "public works of remote usefulness" or such as would "impose unbearable burdens upon the taxpayer" can be overlooked. The suggestion that toll bridges and toll tunnels provide an answer to the present problem will find little acceptance. A claim that public buildings and highways are "nonproductive works" is in conflict with the fact that the Federal Government pays millions each year for rentals, and that highways produce a huge excise income. The assertion that loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are made without issuing Government bonds is a deceptive half truth, since everyone knows that Treasury money has supplied most or all of the corporation's funds.
> But after all, the affirmative content of the President's letter is the essential thing. If we examine this content we find first that he brushes aside the plan of creating employment through public works, except for his unworkable singling out of so-called self-liquidating works, most of which are inevitably speculative. One cryptic paragraph in Mr. Hoover's "program" suggests a more friendly attitude: "The continuation of such public works in aid to unemployment as do not place a strain on the taxpayer and do not necessitate Government borrowing." But this definition lacks interpretation.
> No other plan for making employment is advanced in the letter except the granting of loans to private industry; but no hint is given as to how industry is to put men to work while it lacks orders because so many of its consumers are unemployed.
> In simplest summary it may be said that the President advocates charity and rejects public construction. His message to the country may be expressed as doles for the unemployed and faith in the ability of industry with the aid of public money to provide means of existence for the idle masses before they are reduced to the poorhouse. It is a program of inactivity and little hope.

I wish also to read to the Senate from "A Statement and Appeal to the Mayor and Board of Estimate of the City of New York; to the Governor and Legislature of the State of New York, and to the Public," issued from March 20 to April 20, 1922, and signed by such eminent conservatives as Bishop William T. Manning, Cardinal P. J. Hayes, and many other citizens. The statement says:

> The question is often asked, How can the city, State, or Nation afford to employ the unemployed? Ought not the inquiry to be reversed—how can the State afford not to employ them?
> No policy is so unwise and expensive as our present practice of supporting a part of the unemployed, without labor in return for such support, in our prisons as vagrants and criminals; through public and private charity, and by individual and, therefore, necessarily indiscriminate almsgiving.
> How futile is the cry that we can not afford to employ the unemployed; that taxes are now so high that we must retrench and not embark upon expensive public works for the unemployed! If the unemployed are not starving in our streets—

This statement was issued 10 years ago—

> many are, to our shame—they are being supported. Will it not be a wise economy to obtain from the unemployed themselves some form of productive labor in return for their support?
> Poverty, in the midst of the inexhaustible natural resources and with the unimpaired labor and financial strength of such a country as the United States, is not only a disgrace to the Nation but an indictment of the intelligence of its people and contrary to the ethics of its religion.

Mr. President, if this country is going to continue to retain the respect of the civilized universe, it will devote a little less of its attention to the mere question of balancing the Budget, important though that may be, and will devote an infinitely greater proportion of its attention to the question of restoring the purchasing power of the consuming population of this country, of maintaining the American standard of living, and of preventing misery, unemployment, distress, and starvation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, my understanding of my colleague's amendment is that on page 274, line 22, that portion of the committee amendment beginning with the word "nor" is to be stricken out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that was the amendment which I offered. My attention was called to the fact that what is intended to be accomplished by the amendment would be accomplished by disagreeing to the committee amendment, so I withdraw my amendment. The question now comes upon the adoption of the committee amendment. Those who concur in the views expressed by myself will vote "nay" on the pending question.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand the reason for disregarding the committee amendment is so that a tax would be placed on short sales.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me suggest that short sales would involve the transfer of loaned stocks. That is in reality another type of short sales, but is not a short sale as characterized by the stock exchange. In all its essential particulars it is a short sale.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know whether this particular provision will reach the short sales in general. I am afraid it will not. But whether it will or whether it will not reach all of the short sales, I think it will have a very wholesome effect, and for that reason I hope that the committee amendment will be rejected.

It seems to me rather strange, when we come to deal with the stock exchange, that there are always plenty of Senators who are perfectly willing to defend it. If anyone should rise in the Senate and say that we should try to reach the money that has been made by Al Capone, no one would rise in his place and try to offer the slightest excuse or any technical objection to this or that proposal that we should tax the receipts or the money made by Al Capone. Yet I venture to say, without fear of successful contradiction, that those men who have been operating in Wall Street and have brought about the wreck of many of the greatest industries of the country through short selling, who have wrecked more homes, who have caused more people to commit suicide, and who have brought starvation in the midst of plenty in this country are the very men whom we are seeking to protect upon the floor of the Senate at this time.

When the House sought to put a tax upon the stock exchange, what was the result? Never since I have been a Member of the Senate has such a swarm of lobbyists come here to Washington. Never once while that swarm of lobbyists were here about the Capitol was the President's voice raised with reference to the matter. I think something ought to be done to tax short sales if it is possible to do so. I think the amendment which has been suggested by my colleague will have a tendency in that direction.

I merely want to repeat what I said a moment ago, that so far as I am concerned, I think that those who are talking about others said to be trying to destroy the Government of the United States, those who are talking about racketeers, those ministers who are praying that we shall be delivered from men like Al Capone, might well turn their attention upon those who have been operating in short selling upon the stock exchange and that we and they would be better off if that were done. This applies not only to those who have been operating on the short side, but likewise to those who have been operating on the long side and have been creating pools and boosting the stock market up to unprecedented and unwarranted heights.

Yet, as I said a moment ago, if anyone attempts to propose a measure in the slightest degree affecting the gambling that is going on in the stock market and tries to put out of business through taxation or in any other way that group of individuals who have brought wreck and more ruin to the country, destroyed more homes, destroyed more business enterprises than anything else, immediately we see in this body, here and on the other side of the Chamber, somebody rising in his place to make some technical objection as to why the particular provision should not be adopted for fear it may put out of business the greatest gambling hole in the world. I say without fear of contradiction that the gambling that went on in the stock market had more to do with the wrecking of the country and its financial institutions than anything else that has happened in this country or in any other country. It not only brought wreck and ruin to business enterprises, but to everbody in the country, and it likewise had its effect upon the business of countries throughout Europe.

We recently adopted a resolution to investigate the New York Stock Exchange. Thus far very little has come of it, and I am frank to say that I doubt if anything will come of it to any very great extent. But something should come of it. If nothing comes of the investigation that has been ordered by the Senate and is now being conducted by the Banking and Currency Committee, let me say that when the next Congress assembles I propose to see to it that there is an investigation that will be a real investigation of the stock exchange. Thus far nothing of a substantial nature has come from the investigation now in progress. Why is it that Members of the Senate of the United States are afraid to investigate the gambling on the New York Stock Exchange as they would investigate gambling that is carried on in the ordinary gambling den in any large city?

It is not necessary to permit this sort of thing to be carried on. We ought to have courage enough and sense enough and we ought to have intelligence enough to go ahead and put a stop to the one thing that everyone on the floor of the Senate will admit privately, if not publicly, has done more to bring about the wreck and ruin of our whole economic situation than anything else that has occurred.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the pending amendment not only exempts those who loan stocks for short sales, but those who loan stocks for selling on margin. The trouble with the whole proposal of taxing these stocks is that it is based on the transfer of the stock and not on the selling price of the stock.

When the provision contained in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives was agreed to, there came from our western cities, particularly the cities of the far Northwest, many letters and telegrams declaring that if it was adopted in the form in which it passed the House the stocks which bring a few cents per share in these hard times would be driven off the exchanges, mining stocks in particular. Why? Because under the amendment in its entirety it would cover all agreements to sell and would cover sales that were not transferred on the books.

Under the amendment as it is reported by the Senate Finance Committee the tax of 4 cents a share still exists, and that tax will be avoided simply by indorsing the stock in blank, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] explained this morning, and the stock will not be transferred on the books once out of fifty times that the stock itself is sold back and forth on the stock exchange. We can no more place an effective tax upon the stock-exchange business of the country to-day through this bill than we can tax the Bible. The Bible is not any more sacred in the estimation of those who love it and believe in it than is the stock exchange in the estimation of a large number of those who are voting on this tax bill.

To me it is unbelievable that Members of the House and Senate, if they understand this at all—and we can not excuse their ignorance if they do not—will vote to pass a bill that proposes to tax literally many of the necessities of life and then refuse to vote for amendments to the bill that would place some of the burden upon the daily sales on stock exchanges of the country. Senators say they do not want to tax these stocks now because their price is so low and they do not want to add this burden. Others say we ought not to depreciate the value of seats on the stock exchange. Why did they not think in these terms when they included other taxes in the bill? No; the other taxes will bear down upon the masses of the people by the millions, but this tax would bear down upon those who traffic in stocks which have become so numerous that they are almost as worthless as the paper upon which they are printed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The suggestion has also been made to me from time to time that if we put a tax upon these stocks we would throw out of employment over in New York City and in various other places in the country thousands of people who are employed in stock exchanges. I am reminded that some years ago, when I was a member of the State legislature and we were proposing to pass through the legislature a bill prohibiting gambling, that all the gamblers and many other people surrounded the legislature and said, "You can not pass this bill, because if you do you are going to put out of employment many people who are working in these gambling houses and you will add to unemployment."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think the argument that a small tax upon the stock exchanges will put them out of business simply can not be taken seriously. A business where millions and millions of shares of stock are traded in day after day in this country is not going to be ruined by a tax equal to the collections made by the brokers on everything that is bought and sold. So I refuse to become greatly alarmed by the argument that we are going to throw people out of work. I do believe it would reduce some of the gambling on the exchanges, because it would make the trading in stocks more burdensome. That would be an incidental result that it seems to me would be most highly desirable, and at the same time it would bring in some of the revenue that is so badly needed by the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Quite a number of Senators have asked what is the amendment now to be voted on, so I ask that it may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 274, line 21, the committee propose to strike out the word "deposited" and to insert "deposited, nor upon mere loans of stock."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHEELER. A Senator desiring to eliminate the committee amendment would vote "no" on the roll call?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). Upon this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as upon the previous roll call, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this amendment, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GLENN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who, I understand, is absent from the city. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is absent from the city. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the pair on this question of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr WALCOTT] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. If present, the Senator from Connecticut would vote "yea" and the Senator from Iowa would vote "nay"

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—37

Bailey	Carey	Dale	Goldsborough
Barkley	Coolidge	Dickinson	Hale
Borah	Copeland	Fess	Harrison

So the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. On page 274, line 9——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is another committee amendment yet to be disposed of in that paragraph.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On page 274, line 23, there is another committee amendment yet to be disposed of, which is really a part of the amendment just acted on. I suggest to my colleague that he defer offering his amendment and allow that amendment now to be acted on, because it is merely complementary to the other amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment referred to will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 274, line 23, before the word "loaned," it is proposed to insert the word "so," so as to read "nor upon the return of stock so loaned."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. Now, Mr. President, on page 274, line 9, I move to strike out the figure "4" before the word "cents" and to substitute "6" in place of "4," and on line 11 to strike out the numeral "4" and to substitute the numeral "6."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 274, line 9, before the word "cents," it is proposed to strike out the numeral "4" and to insert the numeral "6"; and in line 11, before the word "cents," to strike out the numeral "4" and to insert the numeral "6."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. The present law provides for a tax of 2 cents, and the Finance Committee increased that by 100 per cent, making it 4 cents.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. May I inquire of the Senator from Utah how much that amendment will reduce the revenue as compared with the House provision?

The fact of the matter is that the House provision would raise many more millions of dollars than would the present law. The House raised it from 2 cents to 4 cents. The Senate Finance Committee did nothing with it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Ways and Means Committee recommended to the House a tax of 4 cents flat. That was double what the present law provides. Then an amendment was adopted upon the floor of the House offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA making the tax not less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the selling price.

Mr. WHEELER. The tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent was stricken out by the Finance Committee and a tax of 4 cents flat was inserted, doubling the present rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Lines 14, 15, and 16, which have been rejected, were offered by the committee. The LaGuardia amendment is at another place in the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. May I ask the Senator from Utah how much will be raised by this 4-cent tax?

Mr. SMOOT. Twenty-two million dollars.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is wrong. The proposition to make the tax one-fourth of 1 per cent was offered on the floor of the House by Mr. LaGUARDIA. The Committee on Ways and Means recommended a flat rate of 4 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will call attention to the LaGuardia amendment later. It does not make any difference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. HARRISON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Montana proposes the following amendment:

On page 274, line 9, strike out "4" and insert "6"; and the same amendment in line 11, page 274.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, that does not indicate to us what the 6 cents is, what rate it is, or on what it goes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the paragraph.

The CHIEF CLERK. The paragraph, in part, reads as follows:

or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or other evidence of transfer or sale (whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such share, certificate, interest, or rights, or not), on each $100 of par or face value or fraction thereof of the certificates of such corporation or other organization (or of the shares where no certificates were issued), 4 cents, and where such shares or certificates are without par or face value, the tax shall be 4 cents on the transfer or sale or agreement to sell on each share (corporate share, or investment trust or other organization share, as the case may be).

The Senator from Montana proposes to strike out the numeral "4" and insert "6" in both places.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, where a certificate of stock is worth 6 cents a share, there will be a 6-cent tax imposed upon it under this amendment.

Mr. DILL. That is true also where it carries a tax of only 4 cents and is worth 4 cents a share. The Senator knows that the way that is avoided now is by not transferring the stock on the books. The owners indorse it in blank. That is why this whole tax is a farce so far as really taxing the stock exchange at all is concerned. It does not tax the trading.

Mr. SMOOT. There is some point where stock is sold because the purchaser thought there was value in it; and if we put a tax of 6 cents a share upon stock of that kind now, what can the owner do with it when it will not sell for 6 cents?

Mr. DILL. There are some stocks selling at 4 cents and some selling at 3 cents.

Mr. WHEELER. There are some selling at 2 cents.

Mr. DILL. But they do not transfer it except once in a large number of sales.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there is a State tax imposed on these transactions, and the State tax amounts to pretty nearly as much as the Federal tax; so that they would not only pay the Federal tax of 4 cents but they would have to pay a State tax also.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was going to make this suggestion: If this amendment should be adopted, the burden and hardship upon those shares of stock that are selling for less than 6 cents could well be cared for by providing that in no case should the tax imposed by this subdivision be more than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the selling price of such shares or certificates, so that in no event would the share that was worth less than 6 cents be affected by the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have already been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll calls, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] has a pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. If present, the Senator from Connecticut would vote "nay," and the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—32

Blaine	Costigan	Johnson	Schall
Borah	Couzens	La Follette	Sheppard

So Mr. WHEELER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the day's business the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 10 o'clock a. m.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I could not hear the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee, which will be found on page 275, line 3.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the chronic disease known as "virulent verbosity" which has raged in the Congress during the last five months is one of the most costly, contagious, and menacing maladies that has ever afflicted the taxpayers of America. It has prevented the enactment of relief legislation for more than a million bankrupt farmers; it has prevented the enactment of relief legislation for more than eight million unemployed men and women who are in dire distress; it has prevented, and still prevents, the passage of the revenue bill and the balancing of the Budget at the staggering cost, through the loss of revenue, of $2,000,000 a day.

The base Indian who threw away a pearl that was richer than all his tribe was a model of thrift in comparison with the indefatigable, inexhaustible, and irrepressible orators whose eloquence is losing the Government more than $83,000 an hour—almost $200 for every beat of the normal human heart. Since the revenue bill was reported by the committee 19 days ago a few interesting and valuable speeches have been made in the Senate. But no Member would solemnly assert that a single vote in this body has been lost or won by anything that has been said in the course of the 120 hours of day and night debate which has been held here in the last 12 legislative days. No one but a tyrant would wish to restrict legitimate, relevant, reasonable discussion. But the debates which appear in the last 12 voluminous numbers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, now before us, contain, according to my best estimate, more than seven thousand times as many words as the Master used to promulgate the Ten Commandments for the guidance and government of all the nations and tribes of men from the days of Moses to the end of the world. If the children of Israel had been encumbered with this ponderous repository of useless verbosity, they would still be in the wilderness; they never would have reached the Promised Land.

It is seriously contended that every important beneficial or justifiable word of discussion in this 7-pound parcel of closely printed paper could have been said just as appropriately and effectively in a single session of five hours. In other words, Congress has practically thrown away 115 precious legislative hours of the last 13 days. Since last December to the deserving unemployed millions who have petitioned us for work we have given nothing but talk; to the destitute who have prayed to us for relief we have given more talk; to the hungry who have implored us to save them from starvation we have given and are giving still more talk.

Under normal conditions the loss of a few weeks or a few months might be regained. But prevailing conditions are not normal. They are abnormal to a terrifying degree. The present is the most critical time in American history since Washington's freezing, starving soldiers, with their bleeding feet stained the snowy fields at Valley Forge. Not only the credit but the very solvency of the Government is at stake. Existing unemployment has shattered every previous record, and multitudes of thoughtful ones grow sick at heart when they contemplate the appalling suffering that enforced idleness has caused all over the land. Want walks every street. Hunger stalks every highway. Famine, hideous and heartless, infests myriads of toilers' homes.

Uncle Sam's house is on fire from the foundation to the roof. And unless the Congress promptly solves the Nation's frightful unemployment problem the fire will become a horrifying, all-consuming conflagration. In this heart-breaking situation reputable papers carry the melancholy prediction that the Senate will long continue the debate on the revenue bill. If we permit this disparaging prophecy to be fulfilled, we shall deserve the bitter condemnation which, because of our inglorious, irritating inaction is daily launched at our heads.

Let us learn wisdom from Solomon, who said, "In all labor there is profit, but the talk of the lips tendeth only to penury."

Let us learn common sense from Job, who in despairing agony cried out to his loquacious friends just as millions are crying out to us, "How long will ye vex my soul and break me in pieces with words?"

If the honorable and accomplished artificers of congressional oratory will henceforth resist the seductive temptation to indulge in unnecessary and unprofitable speech and will vote and work for the next 15 days as persistently and as vigorously as they have talked since last December, the revenue bill will be passed, the Budget will be balanced, and adequate relief measures will be enacted for the bankrupt farmers and for the millions who are pleading for work and wages and bread. And all this can be done in time to adjourn the Congress before the 15th day of June.

Senators, the hands of unemployed men, the hands of destitute women, the hands of starving little children—millions of hands are extended to you, supplicating you to refrain from talking while helpless, hopeless humanity hungers and suffers and dies. Millions are praying to you for immediate, intelligent, and adequate action to rescue the perishing, restore national confidence, and secure the foundations upon which all the institutions of your Government rest.

Let me respectfully join the supplicating hosts and humbly pray you promptly to prove yourselves the patriots, the statesmen, and the humanitarians which at heart you all must wish to be by banishing all unnecessary discussion to the remotest island of oblivion and forthwith enacting the relief legislation for which mankind fervently hopes and devoutly prays.

National necessity is greater than ever before. Your opportunity is just as great as the necessity. If you nobly live up to this opportunity you will save your country, bring unspeakable happiness to untold millions, and write your names in the golden book of immortality.

Until the imperative duties of this hour shall have been performed, if talk we must, let us in our speaking be governed by Mr. Justice Story's sound advice, which is in the following elegant language:

Whene'er you speak, remember every cause
Stands not on eloquence, but stands on laws.
Pregnant in matter, in expression brief,
Let every sentence stand in bold relief;
On trifling points, nor time nor talent waste,
A sad offense to learning and to taste;
Nor deal with pompous phrase, nor e'er suppose
Poetic flights belong to reasoning prose.
Loose declamation may deceive the crowd
And seem more striking as it grows more loud.
But sober sense rejects it with disdain
As naught but empty noise and weak as vain.
The froth of words, the schoolboy's vain parade
Of books and cases—all his stock in trade—
The pert conceits, the cunning tricks and play
Of low attorneys, strong in long array;
The unseemly jest, the petulant reply
That chatters on, and cares not how nor why,
Studiously avoid—unworthy themes to scan,
They sink the speaker and disgrace the man;
Like the false lights by flying shadow cast,
Scarce seen when present, and forgot when past.
Begin with dignity, expound with grace
Each ground of reasoning in its time and place;
Let order reign throughout—each topic touch,
Nor urge its power too little nor too much.
Give each strong thought its most attractive view
In diction clear, and yet severely true,
And as the arguments in splendor grow,
Let each reflect on all below;
When to the close arrived, make no delays
By petty flourishes, nor verbal plays,
But sum the whole in one deep solemn strain,
Like a strong current sweeping to the main!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 275, line 3, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 275, line 3, after the word "facts," the committee report to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That the tax shall not be imposed upon deliveries or transfers from a fiduciary to a nominee of such fiduciary, or from one nominee of such fiduciary to another, if such shares or certificates continue to be held by such nominee for the same purpose for which they would be held if retained by such fiduciary, or from the nominee to such fiduciary, but such deliveries or transfers shall be accompanied by a certificate setting forth the facts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 276, after line 9, to strike out:

(b) The tax provided for in subsection (a) shall be imposed on all sales, agreements to sell, and/or memoranda of sale or delivery consummated entirely within the United States or between citizens or residents of the United States; and in addition, such tax shall also be imposed upon the seller or transferor resident in or a citizen of the United States when the buyer or transferee is not a citizen or resident of the United States. When the seller or transferor is not a citizen or resident of the United States and does not pay the tax imposed by subsection (a), the buyer, if a citizen or resident of the United States, shall be liable for the full amount of such tax subject to the provisos and penalties set forth under subsection (a). A resident or citizen of the United States, acting through a broker or agent abroad, shall be liable for the full amount of the tax provided in subsection (a) as though buying, selling, receiving, or transferring without the intervention of such broker or agent. A broker or agent resident in or a citizen of the United States shall be liable for the full amount of the tax provided in subsection (a) notwithstanding that his principal is or may be a resident or citizen of a foreign country. In all cases where sales or transfers of stock taxable under subsection (a) are consummated through dummies or by ruse or device designed to evade the tax provided in subsection (a), the parties shall be liable for the full amount of the tax as though such dummies, ruse, or device were not employed, provided that nothing in this sentence shall be construed to relieve the parties from the operation of the penalties provided under subsection (a).

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I would like to know from the Senator from Utah why the committee proposes to strike this language out. Here is an amendment which does not change the rate, but attempts to make effective the 4-cent transfer tax. I would like to know why the committee proposed to strike that language out. The provision is that the tax shall be imposed on all sales, agreements to sell, memoranda of sale or delivery, and so forth. What is the matter with that provision?

Mr. SMOOT. The object is to prevent these sales going to Canada.

Mr. DILL. Oh, no; the first sentence has nothing to do with Canada.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is the object of it.

Mr. DILL. The second provision refers to Canada:

The tax provided for in subsection (a) shall be imposed on all sales, agreements to sell, and/or memoranda of sale or delivery consummated entirely within the United States or between citizens or residents of the United States.

There is nothing about foreigners there. Why does the Senator want to take that out? That is for the purpose of getting the 4-cent transfer tax.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is consummated in the United States, of course, it would be taxable anyhow.

Mr. DILL. This is to reach those cases where the transfer is not made on the books. It is to reach them by compelling them to put the stamp on every time the stock goes from one hand to the other.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the object of it.

Mr. DILL. What harm would it do if it covers that kind of sales?

Mr. SMOOT. But it does not cover them.

Mr. DILL. The Senator started to say that this tax is so large he was afraid they would undertake to escape it. They do escape it and will continue to escape it unless we have this provision in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is just the reverse of what the Senator says. The rate was 4 cents and now it has been increased to 6 cents.

Mr. DILL. No; the rate is still 4 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the House rate. The Senate committee proposes to strike out this language in order that these transfers of stock shall not go to Canada and evade the tax.

Mr. DILL. But this is for the purpose of covering them when they do go to Canada:

When the seller or transferor is not a citizen or resident of the United States and does not pay the tax imposed by subsection (a), the buyer, if a citizen or resident of the United States, shall be liable for the full amount of such tax.

Then we have the third provision, relating to "a resident or citizen of the United States, acting through a broker or agent abroad." This is for the very purpose of catching the people who go to Canada to evade the tax. I would like to know why the committee struck it out.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only was the 4-cent tax involved, but the one-fourth of 1 per cent was involved.

Mr. DILL. That is true, and we took the Senator's view and refused to adopt it. But that is not any reason why the safeguards put in here to compel them to pay the tax should be stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. If we strike it out, the 1¼ per cent——

Mr. DILL. We would still have the 4-cent tax just the same.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but we would not have the one-fourth of 1 per cent.

Mr. DILL. This paragraph was designed to reach the people who dodge the transfer tax. Simply because we reduce the high tax is no reason why we should strike out the provisions intended to compel the payment of the tax. I can not understand why the Finance Committee wanted to get rid of the provision that is designed to compel the payment of the tax levied.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] this morning argued that we could not collect this tax because we do not know about the transactions, that the stocks are transferred from hand to hand, and that this provision is designed to cover those very points. I think the Senate committee amendment ought to be disagreed to because it is a provision designed to compel the payment of these taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. If we strike this out in conference, then it will be disposed of.

Mr. DILL. If this provision goes to conference, with the Senate amendment in it, we know the stock-exchange influence will dominate the conferees.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the stock-exchange influence will not dominate the conferees.

Mr. DILL. Let me put it the other way, then. If it goes to conference, it will never come back; but if these safeguards, which the House wrote into the bill, are kept in the bill, the conferees can not take them out. I think the proper thing to do is to protect the collection of the taxes by keeping the provision that safeguards the collection.

Mr. SMOOT. We have already agreed to strike out the provision in lines 14 to 17 on page 724, and upon the basis of that agreement the Senate should strike out this provision.

Mr. DILL. Oh, no; those lines do not refer to this matter.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why the committee did it.

Mr. DILL. Of course the Senator says the committee struck them out because they struck out the other provision, but that does not change the fact that the language on pages 276 and 277 is for the purpose of compelling people to pay the transfer tax. Why should the Senate want to strike out the provision which will insure the payment of the tax?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not agree with the department on this matter.

Mr. DILL. Read lines 14 to 16 and see what we strike out. We struck out the provision that the transfer tax must be at least one-fourth of 1 per cent. We cut down the amount of the tax. Now, because we cut down the amount of the tax the Senator from Utah proposes that we should strike out the provisions that were put in to compel the payment of that tax. Just because the tax is not to be quite so high, the Senator insists that we shall strike out the provisions that would insure the payment of the tax.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The report of the committee says:

Section 722 (b) of the House bill, intended to prevent evasion of the tax by resort to foreign exchanges, has been eliminated. With the reduction in the rate, the danger which subsection (b) was intended to meet will not exist.

Mr. DILL. The first lines of the provision have no reference to foreign exchange. They refer to transactions between citizens of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I think what the Senator from Washington has said is entirely correct. It was contended in the House, after the adoption of the majority amendment, that it was necessary to adopt the language here proposed to be stricken out because it was said that the tax being so high all transactions of this character would be removed into Canada, and therefore the language which is applicable to that kind of a situation contemplated. I think the Senator is quite right, that much of this language is still pertinent. I do not see why the chairman should hesitate to accept it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure the object of the department was——

Mr. DILL. O Mr. President, the Senator from Utah can read the English language and the Senator can understand the English language. It is so plain that even a school boy can understand it. The provision is:

The tax provided for in subsection (a) shall be imposed on all sales, agreements to sell, and/or memoranda of sale or delivery consummated entirely within the United States or between citizens or residents of the United States; and in addition, such tax shall also be imposed upon the seller or transferor resident in or a citizen of the United States when the buyer or transferee is not a citizen or resident of the United States.

That is language which is so plain that a school boy can understand it. What is wrong with it? Why take it out? The Senate has gone far enough when it refused to make them pay a tax of 4 cents a share, but certainly the language put in there to protect the Government in the collection of this tax when it was to be so high ought to be retained even if the tax is not to be so high.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems from the report of the committee that it is not needed.

Mr. DILL. It will do no harm.

Mr. FLETCHER. They do not find any fault with it except that it is not needed.

Mr. DILL. But in fact it is needed.

Mr. FLETCHER. There may be some question about administration, but the committee finds it is not needed. However, if it is believed that it is needed, I see no objection to leaving it in the bill.

Mr. DILL. Let me show the Senator the difference. If we leave out the amendment, there is no possible way to reach any of these sales where they do not transfer the stock on the books. This is intended to reach sales where they do not transfer the stock on the books but where they pass it from hand to hand indorsed in blank. Why should not that provision be left in the bill? It was placed there for the purpose of compelling these people to pay this tax. The Senate has gone far enough when it cut down the tax. We ought not to strike out the provision that will compel the payment of the tax we do levy. I have not yet heard anyone explain anything objectionable or dangerous in the provision if it is left in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. As I said, in the first place, section 722 of the House text was intended to prevent evasion of the tax by reason of foreign exchange. We eliminated that, as the Senator knows. The reduction in rate was intended to meet a danger that will not now exist. That is what the department says, and that is the reason why the committee struck it out.

Mr. DILL. But the committee has raised the rate 4 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. It was 4 cents in the House text and we left it there.

Mr. DILL. What harm would it do to have a provision that will prevent them from going to Canada, as the Senator said? What harm would there be in having a provision that those agreements shall still be taxed?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. REED. In the first place, there is no sense in going to Canada to escape the tax here, because the tax in Canada is substantially the same as the new tax which we are proposing to levy. Nobody would want to do it, in the first place.

Mr. DILL. Then it will not do any harm, will it?

Mr. REED. Yes; it will.

Mr. DILL. What harm will it do?

Mr. REED. The harm is that it is perfectly foolish for the Congress of the United States to pretend to tax a transaction in some other country by people who may be citizens of that other country merely because some time or other they have been residents of the United States. That is what this would do as stated in the House text.

Mr. DILL. But suppose Canada lowers her tax, as she may do very quickly, then the danger will exist and our law will still be in effect.

Mr. REED. The tax will not be enough to justify anybody going up there to evade it. Let us suppose two Canadian citizens who happened to be residents in Buffalo go up to Toronto and one of them sells a Canadian stock or an American stock to the other Canadian there in Toronto. This section pretends to tax them. We have not any more power to tax such a transaction than we have to tax real estate on the moon. It is perfectly foolish.

Mr. DILL. What does the Senator say about the first sentence in paragraph (b)? There is nothing about foreigners in that.

Mr. REED. Yes; there is.

Mr. DILL. What is it?

Mr. REED. Will the Senator follow me? I shall omit the unnecessary words.

The tax provided for in subsection (a) shall be imposed on all sales consummated between residents of the United States wherever consummated.

Mr. DILL. Why not?

Mr. REED. Suppose two Canadian citizens residents of Buffalo go to Toronto and one sells the other some stock in Toronto; how can we tax that?

Mr. DILL. But these are deals consummated entirely within the United States.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is consummated within the United States or between citizens or residents of the United States.

Mr. DILL. Yes; or within the United States.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. DILL. Where is there anything about a foreign country in that sentence?

Mr. REED. The word "or" expresses alternative.

Mr. DILL. But where is there anything about a foreign country?

Mr. REED. There are no jurisdictional limits on it at all.

Mr. DILL. The Senator can not place that construction on language that is as clear as this language is. This would apply to a foreigner or resident in the United States if he consummated the contract in the United States.

Mr. REED. Absolutely.

Mr. DILL. Why should a foreigner come here and trade and not be taxed the same as other people?

Mr. REED. He would be taxed without the use of this language at all.

Mr. DILL. Then it will not do any harm.

Mr. REED. Yes, it will; because after the word "or," occurs the alternative on which the tax is imposed.

Mr. DILL. In what country?

Mr. REED. In any country.

Mr. DILL. No, sir; I beg the Senator's pardon. He can not show me a word to that effect.

Mr. REED. I have just showed it to the Senator.

Mr. DILL. Show me the word.

Mr. REED. I will show the Senator the second time; if he desires; I will be glad to do so.

Mr. DILL. Very well.

Mr. REED (reading):

On all sales * * * consummated entirely within the United States or—

And "or" does not mean "and"—

Or between citizens or residents of the United States.

Mr. DILL. Yes; but it is still within the United States.

Mr. REED. I give up, Mr. President.

Mr. DILL. The Senator's superior attitude does not answer anything. I repeat, there is nothing in this sentence that says anything about any sale outside the borders of the United States. The part that covers transactions outside of the United States is in the next sentence, but the Senator takes the superior attitude that he can read meaning into the language when it is not there.

Mr. REED. If this is not intended to apply to sales outside the United States, it is not needed at all, because the other section quite adequately taxes sales in the United States, and the whole purpose of putting this section in is to tax sales consummated outside the United States.

Mr. DILL. That is true of the latter part of the section, but the first sentence says nothing about foreign countries, and the Senator has not mentioned a word out of the six or eight lines that will justify his argument that it does refer to foreign countries.

Mr. REED. Then, we understand English differently from one another.

Mr. DILL. No; we do not understand English differently.

Mr. REED. Doubtless I am wrong and the Senator is right, but the construction I put on it is shared by everyone else with whom I have talked about it.

Mr. DILL. The latter part of this paragraph refers to sales in foreign countries; there is no question about that; but the first sentence has no reference to sales in any foreign country. I again challenge the Senator to mention the words that refer to any sale outside the United States; there is no language here to that effect. The purpose of this language is to catch the very transactions which the Senator this morning said could not be reached by the taxes we were talking about. It may be that the latter part of this language should be stricken out, but the first sentence of the portion stricken out refers entirely to sales consummated within the United States.

Mr. REED. And they are taxable, anyway.

Mr. DILL. They are not reached; the Senator so stated this morning.

Mr. REED. I did not say that.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator will pardon me, I think he said that we could not reach the transfer of shares in blank and which did not go to the books of the company at all.

Mr. REED. I was merely trying to explain to the Senator the mechanics of the transfer of a stock certificate, but that had nothing whatever to do with this question at all. The whole purpose—perhaps some other Senators may see my point, even if the Senator from Washington does not—of inserting this section was to tax sales made outside the United States; it was to prevent primarily American citizens from going abroad and transacting a tax-free sale, thereby escaping the American tax. With the tax that is fixed by the Finance Committee, there is no longer any inducement for an American to do such a trick, for he would have his expenses for his pains and he would not save any money. That is the first reason against the section; it has ceased to be necessary.

The second reason is that by this language it is pretended to tax foreign transactions between citizens of a foreign country merely because they personally happen to be residents of the United States, although their residence in the United States has nothing whatever to do with the sale. Obviously that is beyond the power of Congress. For both those reasons the Finance Committee thought it wise to strike this provision out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. REED demanded the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. As I am informed he would vote as I intend to vote, I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I understand that if present, he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. GLENN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is absent from the city. Not knowing how he would vote, I refrain from voting.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

I am not advised as to how any of the Senators mentioned would vote on this question if present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 26, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 277, line 20, after the word "cents," it is proposed to strike out—and by striking out the following: "In no case shall the tax imposed by this subdivision be less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the selling price, if any, of such shares, certificates, or rights: Provided further, That."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 278, line 8, after the numeral "1," to insert "and of a kind the issue of which is taxable thereunder."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 278, line 14, after the word "thereof," to strike out "2 cents" and insert "4 cents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 278, line 15, after the word "That," to strike out:

In no case shall the tax imposed by this subdivision be less than one-eighth of 1 per cent of the selling price, if any, of such instrument: Provided further, That.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 278, line 22, after the word "deposited," to insert:

Provided further, That the tax shall not be imposed on deliverics or transfers of bonds in connection with a reorganization (as defined in sec. 112 of the revenue act of 1932) if the entire amount of gain or loss from the exchange or distribution involved in the delivery or transfer is not recognized under the income tax law applicable to the year in which the delivery or transfer is made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate committee left out a word in the amendment agreed to on line 25. It should read, "if any of the."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment has been agreed to. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 279, line 9, after the word "facts," to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the tax shall not be imposed upon deliveries or transfers from a fiduciary to a nominee of such fiduciary, or from one nominee of such fiduciary to another, if such instruments continue to be held by such nominee for the same purpose for which they would be held if retained by such fiduciary, or from the nominee to such fiduciary, but such deliveries or transfers shall be accompanied by a certificate setting forth the facts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 281, Part IV, tax on transportation of oil by pipe line, in line 24, after the words "transportation of," to strike out "oil" and insert "crude petroleum and liquid products thereof," so as to read:

(a) There is hereby imposed upon all transportation of crude petroleum and liquid products thereof by pipe line originating on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act and before July 1, 1934.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 282, line 3, after the words "equivalent to," to strike out "8 per cent" and insert "3 per cent," so as to read:

(1) A tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the amount paid on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act for such transportation.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, some one spoke to me about this particular amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Somebody spoke to me about it, also.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will pass it over for just a moment, I am probably under obligations to call for a quorum in connection with it.

Mr. SMOOT. As I say, somebody spoke to me about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I think the Senator who spoke in reference to this particular matter was the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I do not know whether his interest still continues in it or not; but I am sure that he spoke to me about the same thing.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask that it go over. I believe it was Senator GORE who spoke to me, but I am not sure.

Mr. GEORGE. If it was Senator GORE, I imagine he would not desire to increase the tax. I think his position is as the committee recommended it.

Mr. SMOOT. I judge that would be the case, but I am not sure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator want it passed over? It will be temporarily passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Georgia think it would be agreeable if we should agree to it with the understanding that if Senator GORE desires it to be reopened, we will consent?

Mr. GEORGE. That would be agreeable. I should feel under obligation to have a roll call otherwise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order for the yeas and nays on the amendment will be vacated, and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before we leave the stock-exchange item I want to call attention to a colloquy I had on Saturday with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

At that time the Senator from Wisconsin quoted from one of the Congressmen, who had stated that Mr. Whitney, the president of the New York Stock Exchange, had deliberately and maliciously and willfully and deceitfully sought to mislead the Senate. I said I could not conceive it possible that a man of the high character of Mr. Whitney would indulge in any such effort.

I learned that Congressman CHINDBLOM, of Illinois, had received a letter from Mr. Whitney replying to those charges. I do not care to take the time of the Senate, unless it is desired, to read this letter; but I do ask that the letter from Mr. CHINDBLOM to me, and the inclosure, the letter of Mr. Whitney to Mr. CHINDBLOM, be inserted in the RECORD at this point and referred to the Finance Committee.

In this letter Mr. Whitney makes it very clear that the statement which he had made to the committee was an accurate statement of the facts. I should not be content to have the RECORD fail to show exactly what Mr. Whitney's statement was and have the RECORD show also that, in my opinion, Mr. Whitney was entirely frank in the statement which he made to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letters will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The letters are as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 30, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your request, I take pleasure in handing you herewith a copy of the letter dated the 25th instant to myself from Mr. Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, discussing the remarks made by Representative LAGUARDIA, and my reply thereto in the House of Representatives Saturday, May 21, 1932, with reference to statements alleged to have been made by Mr. Whitney and other representatives of the New York Stock Exchange in regard to the stock-transfer taxes imposed by the Government of Great Britain. I have not had this letter inserted in the proceedings of the House.

Yours very truly, CARL R. CHINDBLOM.

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE,
May 25, 1932.

Hon. CARL R. CHINDBLOM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: My attention has been called to the remarks made by Representative LAGUARDIA in the House of Representatives, Saturday, May 21, 1932, in which he charged that I and other representatives of the exchange had willfully misrepresented the facts in regard to the British tax on security transactions, not only to the Ways and Means Committee of the House but also to the Finance Committee of the Senate. I also read with great interest your very prompt reply, in which you pointed out the basic difference between the American and English methods of taxation, and the fact that the English transfer tax applied only to a limited number of transactions in registered English securities.

In view of Mr. LAGUARDIA's charges, I think you may be interested in knowing precisely what took place. On March 28, 1932, during my absence from town, the Ways and Means Committee of the House hurriedly sent for representatives of the exchange and of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to appear before the subcommittee of which Mr. RAGON was chairman. Two representatives of the exchange and the economist of the Federal reserve bank proceeded immediately to Washington and appeared before the subcommittee on the evening of March 28. In the extended discussions which took place the question of the nature and size of foreign taxes on security transactions was brought up, and the representatives of the exchange explained to the members of the committee that there were three English taxes which affect security transactions.

The first of these is a tax upon the issuance of shares of British companies. This tax is normally 1 per cent, in the case of registered shares, and 3 per cent in the case of share warrants which are bearer instruments. The second tax is the so-called English transfer tax, which approximates 1 per cent but which is applicable only to registered English shares when they are transferred of record. It does not apply to share warrants or registered shares which pass by delivery when indorsed in blank. It, therefore, does not apply to American stock certificates, which are customarily delivered in the form of indorsed certificates. Furthermore, this tax is paid by the purchaser if he desires shares transferred into his own name. It is not like our so-called transfer tax paid by the seller of securities. The third tax is the English contract stamp tax, which is a true sales tax paid by the seller. It is not solely a security tax but applies also to various commercial and financial transactions.

The American transfer tax is essentially a sales tax. It applies to all sales or agreements to sell or transfers of title with or without consideration. It is payable irrespective of whether the purchaser has the stock transferred of record or not. Therefore, in comparing our tax system with the English tax system, it was logical to compare our transfer tax with the British contract stamp tax and not with the British transfer tax, which, as I have said above, is of an entirely different nature. I am advised that these various points were fully discussed before the subcommittee at the hearing on the evening of March 28, and that the analysis of the English tax system presented by the representatives of the exchange was concurred in by the economist of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. Clearly, therefore, Mr. LaGuardia's statement that a willful misrepresentation was made by representatives of the exchange is not true.

On April 15, 1932, I appeared before the Committee on Finance of the Senate and made a statement in regard to the pending revenue bill. In the course of my statement I was asked by Senator BARKLEY if I would make a comparison between our American taxes on security transactions and English taxes. I explained that it was difficult to make a direct comparison because of the different nature of the British taxes and their method of distinguishing between bearer and registered certificates. I pointed out that the English tax on transfers of record was heavy, while the tax on trading in certificates, which, of course, includes American stock sold in England, was light. There was no time to go into an elaborate discussion of the different methods of taxation, but I, nevertheless, pointed out that such differences existed when I was answering Senator BARKLEY. My remarks under this heading are reported on page 1220 of the Senate Finance Committee's hearings. Subsequently, and in response to Senator BARKLEY's request, I submitted to the Senate Finance Committee a table comparing the American taxes with certain foreign taxes on stock sales. The column of this table which referred to the English tax was correctly headed: "London contract tax (pound sterling=$3.50)," thereby clearly indicating that I was comparing the London contract stamp tax with our American transfer tax.

In the face of this record, I am at a loss to understand how Congressman LAGUARDIA can charge me with having made a willful misrepresentation and a deliberate and willful omission in order to deceive the Senate.

One of the questions under consideration by both the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Senate Finance Committee was whether the proposed tax upon security transfers was so high that the volume of transactions would be reduced to a point where the yield of the tax to the Government would be lowered and the security business in this country practically annihilated. The comparison of the proposed American tax with existing foreign taxes was appropriate so as to see whether foreign experience justified the imposition of high taxes and also whether a possibility of evasion by having security transactions made abroad did not exist. For such a purpose only the English tax which had a direct bearing upon the sale of securities had to be considered. The fact that the English have another and an entirely different tax which imposes a substantial burden upon investors who see fit to register their securities in their own names was entirely immaterial. Furthermore, the English contract stamp tax was the only one applicable to English transactions in American securities indorsed in blank. From the point of view of studying the danger of evasion, the London contract stamp tax was the only one which had to be considered. As I have said above, the exchange did not in any way misrepresent the facts. On the contrary, it presented them fully at the hearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means. I can not help feeling that Congressman LAGUARDIA, in charging the exchange with having misrepresented the facts, is attempting to confuse the issue. The fact that the English tax upon transfers of record of English securities is called a transfer tax does not make it directly comparable with our transfer tax. Although the two taxes have the same name, they are essentially different, as must be clear to anybody who will take the trouble to study the matter.

I have written you thus at length because I feel that I am entitled, after the deliberate charges made by Congressman LAGUARDIA, to see that the true facts are presented.

Faithfully yours,

RICHARD WHITNEY, President.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to object to the insertion of the letters in the RECORD; but in that connection, and so that the reference may follow immediately the insertion in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, following the letter of Mr. Whitney, the remarks of Congressman LAGUARDIA.

Mr. COPELAND. I have no objection whatever to the inclusion in the RECORD of the statements of Mr. LAGUARDIA as recited by the Senator from Wisconsin. I am very glad to have the statements there, because, in my opinion, the letter of Mr. Whitney, which I have already inserted in the RECORD, is a complete refutation of the charges made in another body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Saturday, May 21, 1932]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, during the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House on the tax bill the subject of a stock-transfer tax was presented. Comparisons were made between the proposed tax and taxes in other countries, and I am sure that many gentlemen will recall that officials of the New York Stock Exchange stated that if a stock-transfer tax were imposed they could easily transfer their transactions to the London exchange and the Canadian exchange. The stock-transfer tax came up toward the end of the hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means, and this House passed a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent. It was a very live subject before the Senate Finance Committee in its hearings on the bill, and the reason I asked for time this morning is that they are now considering the tax bill on the floor of the Senate.

It is quite necessary that the Senate should be informed on the stock-transfer tax in England. The reason is that it has not received correct information. Were the Senate committee still in session, I would appear before it and present the information that I have. This is the only means now available to inform the Senate that when the president of the New York Stock Exchange appeared before it and was asked specifically to furnish the committee with information on stock-transfer taxes and taxes on transactions on the London Stock Exchange that the committee was deceived. Anyone reading the testimony of Mr. Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, and the table of taxes which he put in, omitting the real stock-transfer tax, can not escape the conclusion that a willful misrepresentation was made, a deliberate and willful omission, in order to deceive the Senate in the hope of defeating the stock-transfer tax placed in the bill by the House. The House transfer-tax provision was eliminated by the Senate committee.

The president of the New York Stock Exchange, Mr. Whitney, appeared before the Finance Committee, and in reply to a question as to the stock-transfer tax in England stated that he had the information; that he would supply the Senate committee with the information; and on April 18, 1932, he furnished the information—which will be found on page 1231 of the Senate hearings—sent it with a covering letter of that date, prepared a comparative statement of the tax in Canada and the proposed tax in the United States and the English tax. When he gave the English tax he submitted only what is known as the contract-note stamp tax, which is only 1 cent on stock transactions of $75 to $150, while the proposed House tax, coupled with the New York State tax, would be 41½ cents. By so doing he deliberately misrepresented the English tax, because he must have known and his experts must have known—as they deal on the London exchange—that there were two additional taxes which were maliciously and willfully omitted from the table submitted by Mr. Whitney, the president of the New York Stock Exchange, to the Finance Committee of the Senate. He thereby led the Senate committee to believe that there was no stock-transfer tax and that the only tax was what is known as the contract-note stamp tax.

This is quite in keeping with the omission of information in the Kreuger-Toll bond issue, in stock flotations, and in the daily paid publicity stock brokers send to their customers in order to sell securities and stock at inflated, artificial prices. As a witness to that I call upon the millions of American investors who have lost billions and billions of dollars since 1929.

When I saw this statement—I knew there was a transfer tax in England; I had referred to it on the floor of the House—I asked the State Department to inquire here in this country from the British Embassy. The State Department informed me that there was a stock-transfer tax in England on stock-exchange transactions, according to the information which they had obtained. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, this is in conflict with the phrase that has been repeatedly given to members of the Ways and Means Committee and to the Senate Finance Committee—that "transactions carried on in the ordinary course of business between members of the stock exchange are excepted from the British transfer tax."

The matter was vitally important, in the face of these contradictory interpretations from such important and authoritative sources. I therefore asked the State Department to cable London and get the actual correct information right at the stock exchange.

I did not want to take any chance whatsoever in charging the New York Stock Exchange officials with deliberately misleading the Senate Finance Committee and our own Treasury Department in stating that they did not think such a tax would be workable. The State Department was kind enough to cable London, and I have here a reply, dated May 19, 1932:

"Transfer tax is 1s. for each £5 sterling or fraction thereof up to £25 sterling; 5s. for each £25 sterling or fraction thereof up to £300 sterling; 10s. for each £50 sterling or fraction thereof above £300 sterling. These taxes apply to both stock exchange and private sales. Short and long transactions subject to transfer tax only when terminated by payment and transfer of title. No separate tax applicable to private sales. For carry-over sales see commercial attaché cable to Commerce No. 391, dated March 3.

"ANDREW W. MELLON."

And, Mr. Speaker, that is signed by a financial authority—Andrew W. Mellon, present ambassador to the Court of St. James, and former Secretary of the Treasury, himself.

Here is the cable referred to, which was sent to the Department of Commerce. It is dated March 3, 1932, and it becomes important by reason of the fact that the Treasury Department officials appeared before the Finance Committee a month later and must have had this information, which the Department of Commerce tells me was available to the Treasury Department. The cablegram is as follows:

[Transcript of cable No. 391, to Department of Commerce, March 3, 1932]

Contract-note stamp required on all contracts evidencing purchase of stock on stock exchange.

Both contract-note stamp and conveyance (transfer) stamp required in all cases of purchase of registered stock involving conveyance (transfer) thereof to the stock broker or banker, to be held as security for customer on time or margin.

Conveyance (transfer) stamp not required when stock purchases involve bearer stocks and stock that pass by indorsements.

Authorities indicate that title passes to customer in case of purchase made by banker or stock broker for customer on time or margin.

Broker and banker have what is known here as a possessory lien and stock to cover debt of customer incurred in connection with the purchase and for general balance owing the banker or stock-broker.

The procedure known as carry-over provides a method of continuing a stock purchase from one settlement to another. With each continuance a continuing contract note is executed requiring a contract-note stamp.

COOPER,
Commercial Attaché, London Embassy.

They clear over there every 14 days. If there is an order for a sale or purchase of stock and that is not cleared, that is "continued" and requires another contract-note stamp, and as soon as the sale is executed, whether short or on margin, or otherwise, the stock-transfer tax applies.

I will, with the permission given me, insert a comparative statement in the RECORD showing a comparison of the present British stock-transfer tax with what was proposed in the House.

To give you an idea, on a stock selling for $10 the British sale tax would be 2½ per cent. Under the tax bill passed by the House it would be one-fourth of 1 cent, and with the minimum provision of the House bill it would only be 4 cents. The minimum in England is 1 per cent, while the highest that was proposed here was one-fourth of 1 per cent.

To illustrate, a $200 sale of stock in England would pay $2.50, while under the House bill it would only pay 50 cents.

I will insert the entire comparison in the RECORD. The following comparison is based upon the sale of 1 share of stock of $100 par value:

Selling price ($100 par value)	British tax (transfer)		United States tax

(This information was sent to us by L. H. Parker, chief of staff, Joint Committee on Internal Revenue.)

I also insert the following table for comparison of the figures given to the Senate Finance Committee by Richard P. Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, and the true transfer tax figures on transfers of securities in England as furnished by Mr. L. H. Parker, chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

[1] As given by Mr. L. H. Parker, chief of staff, Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

Now, gentlemen, I submit that the tax in England is five times what we propose on a $200 sale and proportionately larger on other stock transfers. Responsible officials of the New York Stock Exchange appeared before the committee and only disclosed one of the three taxes applicable to the transaction on the London Stock Exchange. It is not only startling and shocking but it is something which should not remain uncensured. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has expired.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, my purpose is to offer to the House, as a portion of such relief plan as the House may later determine, a public building bill. It is a bill which it was my pleasure to introduce at the last session of Congress—and also at this session of Congress—which would provide for distribution, by congressional districts, of such funds or portion of such funds, as we may have appropriated for Federal construction.

I believe that the bill will be of special interest to my colleagues, and, at the conclusion of my remarks, I shall ask permission to print it in the RECORD. The bill is H. R. 7120 and provides for the construction of post-office buildings to relieve unemployment and economic depression, and for other purposes. It would expend about one-half million dollars in each congressional district, giving buildings for practically all second and third class offices. It provides for local architects, local engineers, local material, where possible, and for local labor. Al sections of the country would benefit equally and alike under its provisions. If the GARNER plan for relief is adopted by the Congress, then this bill, if adopted, will carry out that portion of the plan pertaining to the proposed Federal construction program.

In addition to this bill I desire, if I may, to again call the attention of the House to the importance of at least a partial reimbursement for losses sustained by Florida growers during the Mediterranean fruit-fly campaign. I hope to address the House on that subject next week.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in my remarks this bill for Federal building.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would not the gentleman be willing to refer to the bill by number instead of printing the entire bill in the RECORD? It is five or six pages. If the gentleman will just refer to it by number the membership will be able to get copies of the bill. Therefore I shall have to object.

Mr. GREEN. All copies have been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object to this request; but I will make a point of order when the gentleman finishes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, of course no Member of this House—and certainly not I—could have any possible objection to a contribution for the information of the House, and perhaps the information of the Senate, of the character that was given to us a moment ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I have not had an opportunity to check on the facts presented by the gentleman, but I have no doubt they are substantially correct. Whether misrepresentations were made before the Finance Committee of the Senate by a representative of the New York Stock Exchange, it seems to me is hardly a matter for very prolonged discussion in the House, but might better be presented to another forum, preferably the Senate itself.

However, Mr. Speaker, I arose to say that if we are to pattern our revenue system after the revenue system of Great Britain, we have yet far to go. We will be on the road toward very serious consequences in the United States if we adopt that policy. Great Britain, fortunately, with its homogeneous population devoted to the single cause of preserving and saving that country from the verge of bankruptcy, has been able to impose most drastic taxes upon all of its lines of business and classes of property.

By way of comparison, I might say that under the present income tax law in the United States, a man with a wife and one dependent, having an income of $5,000, at the present time pays $12.38 income tax. In Great Britain he would pay $650.22. A person with an income of $10,000, similarly situated, in the United States under the present law would pay $92.25, while in Great Britain he would pay $1,799.93. Under the pending revenue bill, as passed by the House, the corresponding payments would be $29.50 and $194; and under the proposals of the Senate Finance Committee they would be $44.25 and $271, respectively.

We have not attempted to impose any such taxes upon the people of the United States, nor have we attempted to impose upon business, whether it be the business of the stock exchanges or of the produce exchanges, or the business of the farmer or of the manufacturer or the merchant or anyone else, any such burdens. Let us hope we may not be compelled to impose upon our people any such taxes as are imposed upon the people of Great Britain.

We should rather rejoice than complain that it has not yet become necessary in this country, in comparison with the unfortunate tax burdens of other nations, to practically cripple commerce, agriculture, industry, trade, or even the promotion of the arts and sciences among our people.

Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks, let me say that I do not believe the Treasury Department made any effort to advise either the House Ways and Means Committee or the Senate Finance Committee as to the British tax on stock transfers. I am advised that the system of handling stock sales and making settlement of them is so different in England from what it is in the United States that it is hard to make a fair comparison. There was really nothing new in Ambassador Mellon's cable of May 19, presented here by the gentleman from New York. The transfer tax, amounting roughly to 1 per cent, as the cable states, applies to "short and long transactions subject to transfer tax only when terminated by payment and transfer of title." On the other hand, cable No. 391, from Mr. Cooper, commercial attaché at London, states:

"Conveyance (transfer) stamp not required when stock purchases involve bearer stocks and stocks that pass by indorsements."

To determine to what proportion of all stock transactions the tax of 1 per cent applies it would be necessary to ascertain what part of those transactions involve transfers of title and what part relate to other changes of ownership or control. The extent to which transfers of title are required in Great Britain in the case of registered shares is understood to be greatly reduced by the custom of having fortnightly settlements between brokers, so that what is required to be transferred at the time of settlement is the net balance instead of the aggregate volume of daily transactions. In all events, neither the amount of the British tax nor its method of application seems deserving of enthusiastic emulation by our Government.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am entirely satisfied to have the record made as indicated by the Senators from Nebraska and Wisconsin. Indeed, I court that procedure, because I know Mr. Whitney and I know his very high standing; and while, as I have said before, I hold no brief for the stock exchange or for many of the superbankers of New York, I do always hold a brief for a high-minded man of the character of Mr. Whitney.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 282, line 6, after the word "person," to strike out "paying for such transportation and to be collected by the person," so as to read:

(1) A tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the amount paid on or after the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act for such transportation, to be paid by the person furnishing such transportation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah what became of the amendments on page 282 with reference to pipe lines? Do I understand that they went over?

Mr. SMOOT. No; we are on that subject now. We have agreed to strike out "8 per cent" and insert "3 per cent"; and the next amendment, that is now before the Senate, is on lines 6 and 7, to strike out "paying for such transportation and to be collected by the person." In other words, we are putting the burden upon the pipe line to collect the tax rather than the individual.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do I understand the Senator to say that the amendment in line 3 has been agreed to?

Mr. SMOOT. I understand so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought it had gone over.

Mr. BORAH. Did not the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] want it to go over?

Mr. KING. It was agreed to with the understanding that Senator GORE, or any other Senator, if he desired to have the matter reopened, might have that done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know the Senator from Oklahoma will not want to reopen it, because he was the one who had it reduced in the committee.

Mr. KING. Any other Senator.

Mr. BORAH. If it includes any other Senator, that is all I care about.

Mr. KING. That was the understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment just read by the clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 282, line 11, after the words "equivalent to," to strike out "8 per cent" and insert "3 per cent," so as to read:

(2) In case no charge for transportation is made, either by reason of ownership of the commodity transported or for any other reason, a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the fair charge for such transportation, to be paid by the person furnishing such transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 282, line 17, after the word "to," to strike out "8 per cent" and insert "3 per cent," and, in line 18, after the word "of," to strike out "the difference between such fair charge and the amount paid for such transportation" and insert "such fair charge," so as to read:

(3) If (other than in the case of an arm's-length transaction) the payment for transportation is less than the fair charge therefor, a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of such fair charge, to be paid by the person furnishing such transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 283, line 8, after the word "person," to strike out "collecting the tax imposed under subsection (a) (1) and every person," and, in line 10, before the word "shall," to strike out "(2) or (3)," so as to read:

(c) Every person liable for the tax imposed under subsection (a) shall make monthly returns under oath in duplicate and pay such taxes to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business or, if he has no principal place of business in the United States, then to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall contain such information and be made at such times and in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 283, after line 18, to strike out:

(d) The tax shall, without assessment by the commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time so fixed for filing the return. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 per cent a month from the time when the tax became due until paid.

(e) Any person making a refund of any payment upon which tax is collected under this section may repay therewith the amount of the tax collected on such payment; and the amount so repaid may be credited against amounts included in any subsequent monthly return.

(f) The provisions (including penalties) of section 1114 of the revenue act of 1926 shall be applicable with respect to the taxes imposed by this section.

(g) The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe and publish all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of this section.

Mr. SMOOT. All of that is transferred to page 287.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 315, after line 3, to insert:

SEC. 1106. REFUNDS OF MISCELLANEOUS TAXES

Subsection (a) of section 3228 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The amount of the refund shall not exceed the portion of the tax, penalty, or sum paid during the four years immediately preceding the filing of the claim, or if no claim was filed, then during the four years immediately preceding the allowance of the refund."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sent to the desk this morning an amendment in that connection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Utah offers the following amendment in connection with section 1106:

On page 315, line 5, at the beginning of the line, insert "(a)."

In line 8, after "refund," insert "(in the case of taxes other than income, war profits, excess profits, estate and gift taxes)."

And after line 12 insert a new subsection to read as follows:

"(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) of this section to section 3228 of the Revised Statutes shall not bar from allowance a claim for refund filed prior to the enactment of this act which, but for such enactment, would have been allowable."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the first amendment passed over was on page 16, line 10.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Utah what was done with the tax on safe-deposit boxes on page 284? Did we amend that?

Mr. SMOOT. That was agreed to when we passed over some of these proposals, the first time we went through the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the Senator recalls that we had a meeting of the committee the other day, and, I thought, agreed to a new amendment on that subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we did.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that the one that was adopted?

Mr. SMOOT. I offered it as soon as I came into the Chamber, and it was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. I see.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I ask whether Senator GORE is to attend the session to-day? Does anyone know?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I understand that the Senator from Oklahoma is attending some ceremony at Arlington this afternoon. I expect him to return later.

Mr. SMOOT. The first two amendments that were passed over were passed over because of the fact that he was out of the city.

Mr. KING. In view of the Senator's interest in these amendments, I suggest that we pass them over temporarily. I think the Senator from Oklahoma will return to the Chamber when the exercises at Arlington are concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Without objection, the amendment on page 16, line 10, will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the next amendment passed over was on page 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, to strike out lines 8 to 24, both inclusive, and on page 32, to strike out lines 1 to 7.

Mr. SMOOT. That went over at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF].

Mr. KING. I ask that the amendment may go over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to be inserted on page 65, following line 3. I desire to withdraw that amendment and to offer a different one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 65, line 3, after the word "purchases," the Senator from Nebraska proposes to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That any such association shall not be denied exemption because it does not keep ledger accounts with nonmembers of the business it transacts with such nonmembers, but it shall only be required to keep such records of its business with nonmembers as will show the actual business done with such nonmembers and the profit, if any, derived therefrom: And provided further, That the profits, if any, derived from its business with nonmembers in any fiscal year of the association shall be allowed to remain in the business of the association subject to the right of such nonmember to use his share upon a patronage basis to qualify as a member of the association.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this amendment does not tend to change the law, but to clarify the exemptions which we have allowed to cooperative associations of producers of farm products.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. What became of the amendment on page 63, line 10? I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to ask that that go over in order that he might change the language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that amendment was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Now, the Senator from Nebraska is seeking a further amendment on the next page?

Mr. NORRIS. I am seeking an amendment on page 65, at the end of line 3.

This particular section with reference to exemptions runs over several pages. The House language is existing law. The House provided for exemption from the payment of tax cooperative—associations organized and operated on a cooperative basis (a) for the purpose of marketing the products of members or other producers, and turning back to them the proceeds of sales, less the necessary marketing expenses, on the basis of either the quantity or the value of the products furnished by them, or (b) for the purpose of purchasing supplies.

The law provides for the exemption of such associations from paying a profit tax because, as a matter of fact, no profit goes to that kind of an association.

In order to make sure that the members of this sort of an association should be entitled to this exemption, on page 64 the existing law is set out. For instance, it provides, beginning near the top of the page:

Exemption shall not be denied any such association because it has capital stock, if the dividend rate of such stock is fixed at not to exceed the legal rate of interest in the State of incorporation or 8 per cent per annum, whichever is greater, on the value of the consideration for which the stock was issued, and if substantially all such stock (other than nonvoting preferred stock, the owners of which are not entitled or permitted to participate, directly or indirectly, in the profits of the association, upon dissolution or otherwise, beyond the fixed dividends) is owned by producers who market their products or purchase their supplies and equipment through the association.

I have not read all of that, but just enough of it to show that the subject is the question of the exemption of these organizations.

Mr. President, this matter came before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the shape of a resolution for investigation, because the charge was made that the officials of the Bureau of Internal Revenue were making certain exactions on these organizations which made it impossible for them to get the benefit of the exemption features of the law. A subcommittee was appointed, and they took evidence. They have not concluded the investigation, but they went far enough to convince the subcommittee that we should probably remedy the difficulty and settle the controversy which exists between the Bureau of Internal Revenue and these associations by an amendment to the pending bill. We reported such an amendment to the full committee, the committee approved it, and I was authorized to offer it in the name of the committee, and as I first had it printed it was in the form which had been approved by the committee.

Within the last few days the subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from West Virginia, the Senator from South Dakota, and myself, have ascertained that that amendment, as we proposed it, would probably conflict with the laws of some of the States where these cooperatives exist. So we have changed the amendment, and the amendment as now offered is approved by the subcommittee. We have had no opportunity to submit it to the full committee, because there has been no meeting of the full committee since the amendment was changed.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. A suggestion was made on the part of the representatives of the Bureau of Internal Revenue that this course be taken by the committee in order to get this kind of relief for the cooperatives.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Did the investigation made by the committee referred to by the Senator reveal any considerable amount paid in dividends by these concerns?

Mr. NORRIS. Not very much. I am coming to the matter of the amount of the dividends. Of course, the dividends are very small. It is impossible for me to say how much they amount to, but they probably run from $35, $40, or $50 up to sometimes $100, in the case of an association.

Mr. COPELAND. Did the aggregate run up into the millions?

Mr. NORRIS. No. They are supposed to have exemptions now under the law, but they are not all getting them, because of what the committee believes are technicalities which the experts of the bureau require of these organizations, composed in 90 per cent of the cases entirely of farmers, producers of stock and grain.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. My information is that there have been one or more refunds to the Hawaiian Sugar Co. and other organizations claiming to be cooperatives, organizations which possibly within the letter if not within the spirit of the law are cooperatives.

May I say to my friend from Nebraska that information has come to me that in some instances bankers and capitalists are members of these so-called cooperatives, having acquired a few shares of stock and probably owning some land or some dairy farm or some dairy products; and, having accumulated considerable stock, are the beneficiaries of rather large profits, far greater than they would obtain in their regular business. I was wondering whether the subcommittee had found evidence of that fact.

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President; in my judgment that is not involved. If there is such a condition, this amendment would not affect it one way or the other. In my judgment, such organizations as the Senator mentions would not be affected one way or the other by this amendment. The people who would be affected are the small corporations, associations organized for a cooperative purpose under the laws of the several States, particularly in the Middle West, where a large number of these organizations exist.

State laws, as a rule, while they vary some, are very strict. Let me give the Senator something of an idea of the law which exists in my State. Where farmers growing wheat, for instance, want to buy an elevator, so as to get the benefit of the full price of the wheat produced in the community, the law provides that, in order that they may obtain money with which to operate, capital stock may be issued upon which a dividend is to be paid. The law provides that the capital stock, which can be subscribed to by anybody, shall be limited to a very small amount, and the rate of interest is limited in my State to 8 per cent, and the owners of the stock have no voting power. It is simply for the purpose of giving them a capital to operate on.

The members operate the organization themselves; they select a board of directors, and in 99 cases out of 100 the board of directors will be composed of farmers living in the community. The residents of a near-by town may subscribe to some of the stock, upon which they can not get interest to exceed 8 per cent, by virtue of their ownership, and they have no vote whatever in the operation.

They operate for a season. They have a fiscal year. At the close of the year they close up their books. Let us say that one of these little organizations, outside of the holders of the stock composed of the farmers of the community, perhaps 50, perhaps 100 of them, has sold the wheat to the organization, and that that wheat has been thrown on the market. Let us assume they make a profit, and that at the close of the year they have $10,000 profit. Every farmer who sold wheat has received the market price. The organization pays that, the same as any elevator would. They have been paid in cash. But if from the sale of the wheat by the elevator to Kansas City, or Chicago, or Duluth, or any other place, there is a profit which the middleman would otherwise get, that profit goes to the organization.

First, there is paid 8 per cent upon the stock to the men who have furnished the capital stock, and that is all they get. The balance of the profit is divided up among the farmers who have furnished the wheat, in proportion to the number of bushels of wheat which they brought in.

That is a cooperative organization. Other States have different laws, but they are very similar to that in Nebraska. The principle underlying them in all the States is the same. Nobody makes any profit. The case I am citing is that of a purely cooperative organization of farmers who raise wheat.

Congress undertook to give to that kind of an organization an exemption from the payment of income tax, because all the members pay their own individual income taxes, if they have sufficient incomes, and because in the organization as such there is absolutely no profit. The profit is all paid to the men who furnished the wheat. That is the law now. They are supposed to be exempt. Of that kind of organization there are nearly 12,000 now in the United States. Less than 700 have succeeded in getting the exemption. Most of them do not try because of the experience and the difficulties of those who have tried.

Here is what happens. Let us take the same imaginary corporation I have been describing. It has a board of directors of five men who are farmers. They live out on their farms. They are wheat raisers. The other wheat raisers elect them as a board of directors. They select a man to manage the elevator. He buys and sells the wheat. They make their returns. Here is one of the difficulties that arise.

Some farmer who raises wheat out in this community is not a member of the association and he brings to the association a load of wheat. It may be in the community where the association has the only elevator. It may be a little community that has just a post office and one store. It may be in a large city, where there are a dozen private elevators. The farmer who is not a member comes to this elevator owned by the cooperative association and sells a load of wheat.

Congress did not want to prevent these men from taking the wheat of somebody who was a nonmember because in hundreds of communities it would make it impossible for the nonmember to sell his wheat without hauling it a long distance, because the cooperative organization might be the only outfit prepared to buy the wheat. That would have forced him into the organization. It was not the desire of Congress to compel anybody to go in, but to permit him to stay out if he wanted to do so.

The law provides that the cooperative organization may not do more than 50 per cent of its business with those who are not members. If it does, it loses the right of exemption. In the cooperative organization, if they have 25 per cent of the farmers in the community who do not belong to the organization, but who bring in their wheat, they would still be entitled to the exemption. But upon wheat brought in by the nonmembers, if there was a profit at the end of the season, that profit would accrue just the same as though they had been members. The association must keep their records so as to show exactly how much business they do with nonmembers as well as how much business they do with members.

To be technical about it, the man buying the wheat would probably be another farmer who would have to keep books. He would have to open up a ledger account with every man who was not a member as well as with those who were members, showing the amount of wheat sold, when it was sold, how much was paid, so that at the end of the year they could make a computation of how much that man was entitled to receive.

If they do business with 100 farmers who are not members of the association, they would have to open up 100 different accounts. They are not expert bookkeepers. They do not keep their books that way, but they do keep records to show what they buy of nonmembers, how much they buy, and the profit at the end of the season. The smart auditor, the man representing the bureau, who wanted to show his ability to hold his job, would come out in the country to the organization I have described and would call in these five farmers who were the board of directors. They do not know much about bookkeeping. The man who is keeping the accounts of the elevator is not an expert bookkeeper, but he is able to show, as he must be able to show under this amendment, just how much business he did. They do it by keeping tickets, as they call them. When a farmer sells a load of wheat there is a ticket issued for it. It is made in duplicate. One copy goes to the farmer and the other is kept by the organization, hung on a hook there, and that is the only record they keep. At the end of the season this manager computes how much of the profits belong to the nonmembers.

But the representatives who go out from the bureau, when they get these farmers in there, scare them nearly to death; and I am going to place in the RECORD some letters showing how they scared these men nearly to death. They made them believe they had made returns that were false, that were untrue, and that they were liable to prosecution and that they might go to the penitentiary. Then, when they had them properly frightened they pulled a statement out of their pockets which these men signed, sometimes without reading, and in no case that I ever heard of did they ever get a copy of what they signed. In a few days they would get notice that their right to exemption was canceled, that they had no exemption, that their own statement showed they were not entitled to exemption, and they did not get any exemption.

Cases of that kind can be multiplied by the hundreds. That was the kind of treatment that brought about the investigation before the committee. That was why the subcommittee was appointed to investigate the situation. When we went into session, as chairman of the subcommittee I invited the Bureau of Internal Revenue, as I had notified them on the introduction of the resolution, to appear at the hearings. I think six of their men were there. There was one man representing the farmers, the auditor whom they hired to go out and examine their books or their accounts. The farmers were not able to come here to testify. I think six representatives from the bureau were present, and their names appear in the record.

There were some other technicalities, pure technicalities. There was no question about the good faith of these organizations. There was no question but what they were being denied the exemptions that the law provided for them. I see honoring me with their attention the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], who heard all the testimony. If I have made or if I shall before I conclude make a statement not corroborated by the evidence that was produced there, I hope they will correct me and call it to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am curious to know whether in the investigation the subcommittee considered some of the big cooperatives, like the Hawaiian Sugar Co. and some of the fruit and citrus companies in California, the wine growers of California, and others claiming to be cooperatives, handling millions and perhaps receiving large profits, as the Hawaiian Sugar Co. did. As I understand, the Government paid $400,000 in refunds to that cooperative.

Mr. NORRIS. No; we did not investigate them. There is nothing in this amendment that will give them any privilege they do not have now. There is nothing in this amendment that will do anything except to give to the farmers, who are not expert bookkeepers and who can not keep their records according to the demands of the experts in the bureau, what the law intended to give them. If the kind of organizations referred to by the Senator are getting anything they are not entitled to now, this will not enlarge that right and it will not curtail it, I am sorry to say, because I would like to curtail it if I could.

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think that the experts to whom the Senator referred or other experts of the Internal Revenue Bureau seem to be more concerned with some of the little organizations such as the Senator describes than some of the large so-called cooperatives which have imposed upon the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this point to insert in the RECORD without reading, unless some Senator desires, the resolution under which the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was acting, together with the opening statement made as set forth on pages 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the hearings before the subcommittee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter is as follows:

"[S. Res. 43, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas a large number of controversies have arisen between various farmers' cooperative organizations in different parts of the country with the officials of the Bureau of Internal Revenue regarding the exemption features of the present revenue act as applied to farmers' cooperative organizations (sec. 231, par. 12, act of 1926, and a similar paragraph in the 1928 act); and

"[Whereas it is claimed by representatives of various farmers' cooperative organizations that the officials of the Internal Revenue Bureau are guilty of acts of intimidation against officers and employees of various farmers' cooperative organizations, in that said officers and employees have been, through threats and otherwise, induced to sign affidavits and make statements concerning the financial operations of said cooperative organizations, by which the said officers and employees have been frequently induced to pay taxes against such organization when, as a matter of fact, no tax is or was due under the law; and]

"Whereas it is claimed on the part of the officials of farmers' cooperative organizations that the Internal Revenue Bureau is not fairly administering the tax-exemption feature of the laws which apply to such organizations but is compelling the officials of such organizations to pay taxes which have been illegally assessed; and

"Whereas it is claimed by the officials of such cooperative organizations that instructions have been given these associations at variance with and contrary to the exemption features of the revenue acts governing the taxable status of farmers' cooperative organizations by which a large number of said cooperative organizations have been misled as to their legal rights and have not made claims to exemptions when, as a matter of fact, they were entitled to such exemption under the law: Therefore be it

"Resolved, (1) That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the entire question of the exemption of farmers' cooperative organizations under the various revenue acts and ascertain whether or not the officials of the Internal Revenue Bureau have been guilty of any unfair or illegal practices in regard to the exemption features of the revenue acts as they apply to farmers' cooperative organizations.

"(2) That the committee ascertain specifically whether or not the officials of the Internal Revenue Bureau have been unjust or unfair in their attempt to enforce the said revenue acts as against such farmers' cooperative organizations.

"(3) That the committee ascertain whether or not the intent and spirit of the revenue act has been fairly and judicially enforced in regard to the exemption features in said law applying to farmers' cooperative organizations.

"(4) That the committee ascertain whether or not such farmers' cooperative organizations have received the full benefit of the exemptions for such organizations provided for in the law, and, if they have not received such benefit, has the same been brought about by any dereliction, inefficiency, or illegal acts of any of the officials of said bureau.

"Said committee is hereby authorized, in the performance of its duties, to sit at such times and places, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as it deems necessary or proper. It is specifically authorized to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœna or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, clerical, and other assistants; and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words.

"Said committee is hereby specifically authorized to act through any subcommittee authorized to be appointed by said committee or by the chairman thereof. The chairman of said committee or the chairman or any member of any subcommittee appointed hereunder may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or who appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law.

"The expenses of said investigation, not exceeding in the aggregate $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers signed by the chairman of the committee or the chairman of any subcommittee.

"All hearings before said committee shall be public."

Senator NORRIS. The resolution was once passed on by the full committee, who reported it to the Senate. Inasmuch as it provided for an appropriation from the contingent fund, it automatically went before the Committee on Audit and Control. That committee held it for some time. At least, they were holding it up because of this appropriation made from the contingent fund. There was no objection to the balance of it.

It occurred to me that we might possibly get the evidence without passing the resolution, and at my request the Senate discharged the Committee on Audit and Control and reported the resolution back to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Then, at my request, the chairman of that committee appointed a subcommittee to consider it. It is possible that we can get all the evidence that is necessary in this preliminary hearing.

The result of this resolution, which I introduced on the 9th day of December, was the culmination of a great deal of consideration that had been given to the subject, upon complaints made by the Farmers Union of my State.

I took the matter up with the Internal Revenue Bureau, and after a good deal of consideration and correspondence back and forth, I thought we had reached an agreement, whereby the denial of the exemption from the taxation order of the bureau would be reopened and another hearing be had; and I had the understanding that Mr. French, who is the attorney for the Farmers Union, would be invited in by the board or the officials of the bureau in the reconsideration.

It was my belief—and I still hold to that idea—that if there could have been a fair talking back and forth between the representatives of the Farmers Union and the bureau, across the table, with technicalities thrown aside, an understanding could have been reached. As a matter of fact, I left Washington—that was in the last Congress—under the belief that that agreement had been reached and they were going to consider it in that way. But when I returned I discovered it had not been done, the cases had been reopened and passed on again by the bureau, and Mr. French had no opportunity according to the understanding I thought I had that he was to have. So I introduced this resolution.

The claim is made by the Farmers Union that the bureau has not given them the benefit of the exemption features of the taxing law. Under the law, we undertake to exempt cooperative organizations of farmers, and these various associations and organizations of a cooperative nature belonging to the Farmers Union in Nebraska had been having trouble, as I said, with the bureau.

I know it was the intention of Congress—and I think everybody will agree with that—that we wanted to exempt these cooperative organizations. I have seen them grow in my State. I have seen the difficulties they have been up against. From my correspondence here the claim is made, at least, that these objections are technical and that the bureau has not given to the act a liberal construction.

A great many of these cooperative organizations, with which I am personally acquainted, are organizations of farmers operating cooperative elevators. They are mostly farmers. They are not experts in bookkeeping. I have no doubt but what in a technical sense any expert could find fault with the way they keep their books, but I am convinced in my own mind that they have been perfectly honest and that they are not trying to evade any law, that they are trying to comply with the rules and regulations of the bureau, and they feel that they have not been properly treated.

Possibly we ought to show at this point that the bureau is represented here by Mr. Burnet; and will you give the other names of the gentlemen here?

Mr. BURNET. David Burnet, commissioner, Bureau of Internal Revenue; Mr. Clarence M. Charest, general counsel; Mr. L. K. Sunderlin, head of rules and regulations; Mr. P. R. Baldridge, special deputy commissioner; Mr. L. P. Watson, member of the general counsel's office; and Mr. Bartholow, Benjamin H. Bartholow, special assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Senator NORRIS. And the Farmers Union is represented hereby Mr. French. What are your initials, Mr. French?

Mr. FRENCH. Arthur S. French.

Senator NORRIS. Mr. French is attorney for the Farmers Union of Nebraska.

I believe I ought to read some of these letters that I have gotten, that set forth the claims on the part of this union. For instance, here is one [reading]:

FARMERS UNION COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION,
Neligh, Nebr., November 14, 1931.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are operating a cooperative general store and have filed income-tax return reports for many years until in 1928 our attention was called to the fact that as a cooperative we should be exempt. We accordingly filed our claim, and on September 7, 1929, we were granted this exemption by the bureau.

Mr. Congdon, of the Omaha office, filed a report with the commission, recommending that our exemption be denied on the grounds that we were not treating nonmembers and members alike with regard to distribution of patronage dividends. In the early summer of this year a party of men, consisting of Mr. Newberg, Mr. Barbour, Mr. Smith, of Washington, D. C., and Mr. Congdon, of the Omaha office, called and asked for more information regarding the manner in which we conducted our business with the thought of rechecking Mr. Congdon's report to headquarters. After the three gentlemen above referred to from Washington, D. C., had made the necessary examination and found the information desired, they, collectively, stated to me that our records were all right and that they would recommend our exemption be confirmed and remain as granted.

Now I am informed that they have filed a report with the commission that the revenue agent's report is correct and that we are not entitled to exception. I have written the Omaha collector to this effect, but he advises me that his instructions require him to secure a report for the years past, 1929, 1930, and 1931.

I am writing to you asking for your assistance in obtaining justice, as I am doing everything I know of in conforming to the requirements of a cooperative organization to entitle me to this exemption. I am inclosing last year's financial report as proof of my claim and wish to direct your attention to the items at the bottom of the sheet, as follows:

General stockholders at 3 per cent, $1,882.93; nonstockholders at 3 per cent, $1,807.12.

If you can find time to look into this matter and desire further information, please write me.

Yours truly,

FARMERS UNION COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION,
ALVIN E. GRAYBIEL, Manager.

Here is an other letter from the Farmers Union Cooperative Exchange, H. C. Bredemeyer, manager, Hartington, Nebr., directed to me [reading]:

HARTINGTON, NEBR., December 20, 1930.

GEORGE W. NORRIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of December 15, 1930, we employed Arthur S. French, through the Farmers Union State Exchange, to try and get back for us income tax that we paid for 1926, so he came to Hartington, Nebr., and checked over our books, getting all the records that he claimed were necessary to get us back our income tax that we had paid, which I signed before a notary public.

Then, last year, about February or March, along came two men from the Internal Revenue Bureau, asking for our books, which they, with the assistance of our auditor, checked over, and when they got through asked me if I knew where Mr. French had gotten his figures and if I had signed those papers, to which I told them that we had hired Mr. French as our attorney and under his directions I had signed, so they went on telling me that I had laid myself liable by signing something that I did not know what it was or where Mr. French had gotten his records, and then went on and asked me if I would be willing to sign the affidavit that they had, releasing me from the other by claiming that I did not know how Mr. French had gotten his records, which I refused to do and I told them that we had hired Mr. French as our attorney, through the recommendation of the Farmers Union State Exchange of Nebraska and that he would take care of this for us.

So I did not hear any more from them until about a month ago I got a letter from the department telling us that our claim had been turned down, and this letter I sent to Mr. French.

Yours truly,

FARMERS UNION COOPERATIVE EXCHANGE,
H. C. BREDEMEYER, Manager.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read to Senators a list of those who were present. Mr. Burnet, Commissioner, Bureau of Internal Revenue, was there; Mr. Charest, general counsel of the bureau; Mr. L. K. Sunderlin, head of the rules and regulations of the bureau; Mr. P. R. Baldridge, special deputy commissioner, were all present. Mr. L. P. Watson, member of the general counsel's office, and Mr. Benjamin H. Bartholow, special assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, were present. They were invited to be present. They were invited to cross-examine the only witness who appeared on behalf of the farmers.

This witness was an accountant. He is referred to in the hearings as an attorney. As a matter of fact, he was employed by the Farmers Union of the State of Nebraska to go to the separate individual organizations and try to help them get the exemptions to which the law provides they shall be entitled. He testified, giving to the committee his experience and relating his activities, showing that he was an accountant, that he was an expert, that for many years he worked as such for the Government, resigning several years ago to go into private practice, and having an office in the city of Washington. The cooperative associations had to employ this man in order to get what we intended, when we passed this law, should belong to the cooperatives as a matter of right without any expense and without any effort.

The letters to which I have referred tell the story. I could fill the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with them. On page 5 of the hearings is a letter which I am going to read, and I am picking this one merely at random. There are hundreds like it, but only a few were printed in the hearings in order to prevent encumbering the record. This letter reads as follows:

FARMERS COOPERATIVE GRAIN & LUMBER CO.,
Humphrey, Nebr., October 2, 1930.

Mr. H. G. KEENEY,
President Farmers Union, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR MR. KEENEY: I think you should know about the experience I had with the revenue men from the Omaha office.

Your representative, Mr. French, called upon me last year to talk about income-tax exemption. He left a questionnaire and a power of attorney for our signatures, with instructions to take up with our board of directors if we wanted to get exemption. They decided to ask for exemption and the papers were sent to Mr. French. Later we received our exemption letter from Washington, as Mr. French said we would.

Later two revenue agents called upon me and went over our books. By questioning me about the questionnaire and working with me they had me scared that I had done something I ought not to have done and they presented an affidavit and asked me to sign. This I did, without knowing what I had signed or the effect it might have upon our claim for exemption. They did not leave a copy of the papers with me and I have no way of knowing what was on the affidavit.

I do not think this is treating us managers right, as we do not know anything about income-tax matters and think you should know about it.

That is a sample of the complaints these men made, and I have some letters that are much worse than this one. Here is another letter to Mr. Keeney. I will read a part of it, and I will ask permission to insert all of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. NORRIS. The letter reads as follows:

FARMERS UNION STORE,
Guide Rock, Nebr., October 8, 1930.

Mr. H. G. KEENEY,
President Farmers Union, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR MR. KEENEY: We have been having so much trouble with the representatives of the revenue department at Omaha that I think I should call it to your attention, in hopes that you and the State board can take steps to see that we receive fair treatment.

In the first place, a Mr. Brown, from Hastings, called upon us in connection with our income-tax return for 1928. He stated that it had not been filed, but we advised him that we had filed our claim for exemption. After several trips here he finally told us that he wanted a check for the tax and an additional penalty of $1,500. He said he was going to stay here until he received the check for the entire amount. We advised him that Mr. French had charge of our income-tax work and we have not seen him since, neither have we paid the taxes he demanded.

Later we were visited by two agents from the revenue agent's office in Nebraska, who had been sent for the purpose of investigating our exemption claim. They told us that if we could show them that we did more business with members than nonmembers that we could qualify and they would recommend exemption. Our office proved to them very clearly that the business with members exceeded the nonmembers' business in a very short time, but they still stayed here for two days, apparently trying to find other operations that would prevent us from qualifying for exemption. During their stay they advised us that it was a very serious offense to sign a questionnaire with estimates, that the estimates might not prove out and then in that case it would go hard for the party that signed the questionnaire.

It was apparent that after we had proved our exemption rights that they tried to scare us into the thought that asking for exemption was a dangerous thing to do, and that we had better withdraw our claim.

After two days they finally found a clause in our by-laws that had been passed in 1930 for the use in future years that they now apply to the past years 1925 to 1928, inclusive, and have advised the Washington office that we do not qualify for exemption. The new by-law, if effective at all, merely affects the future years and not the period under examination by them.

Senators will understand what that means. These agents were trying to make, and evidently did make, a by-law that was adopted in one year applying to business that was transacted prior to its adoption.

In any event, we have received our denial of exemption, and after we had notified Mr. French he had a conference with the officials at Washington, and has since advised us that the only reason that appeared at the conference was the clause in the by-laws that had been taken from the agent's report.

We have instructed Mr. French to continue his efforts to procure our exemption; but the question with us is, Why are the cooperative associations of this State put to all of this trouble with the revenue agents to procure the rights that have been afforded us by the law?

Why do the revenue agents try to scare and bulldoze us into keeping us from getting exemption? I thought you would be interested in this experience, and we will give you more details if you desire.

Yours truly,

S. SHIPMAN, President.

Here is another letter found on page 6 which I will read in part and include all of it in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. NORRIS. The letter is as follows:

FARMERS UNION ELEVATOR CO.,
Bloomfield, Nebr., September 29, 1930.

Mr. H. G. KEENEY,
President Farmers Union, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR MR. KEENEY: In January, 1929, Mr. Reynolds, our district representative on the State board of directors, advised us of the arrangements that had been made with Mr. French in regard to getting exemption from income taxes. In August, 1929, I gave Mr. Reynolds a signed blank questionnaire for the purpose of filing for exemption of our association, as I understood that Mr. French had been furnished with the information necessary for filing. The questionnaire was filed in August, 1929, and in September, 1929, our association was advised that they had been granted exemption from income taxes.

During February, 1930, two or three revenue agents called at our office for the purpose of looking at our records. I was away at the time, but the men waited until I returned, and I was called to our office to meet them. Very soon after I had arrived I was told by one of the men, named Hayes, that I had signed a false affidavit in the claim for exemption, that the signing of a false affidavit was a very serious offense, and that there was only one thing to do to protect myself. The men even mentioned the Federal prison at Leavenworth. Mr. Hayes then showed me an affidavit which he drew from his pocket and asked me to sign.

It will be noticed that the affidavit was prepared before the interview—

Not knowing anything else to do and being scared of what might happen if I did not sign, I signed the affidavit at his suggestion.

You know, being a farmer, that I do not know about such things as income-tax matters. I have no idea of what was in the affidavit and a copy of the paper was not left with me. I do not know whether the affidavit will be used to affect our exemption or not, as our association is still exempt; but why does the Revenue Department think it necessary to scare us farmers into doing these things? If getting exemption means all this trouble, it is not worth it; and why was our association picked out in this manner, as so many of our neighbors are not having this trouble?

Our men were so scared because these revenue agents talked the way they did that we filed our income-tax return for 1929 and paid about $317 tax, even though we still have our exemption from even filing returns, and we will now have to wait a long while for our refund. After getting exemption for the years 1925 to 1929 we filed refund claims last October for taxes paid in those years, but here it is almost one year later and we have not received our money for our refunds.

I thought that you should know about such things, as we should not be treated in this manner; and if our representatives in Congress knew about such things I think they would see that it is stopped.

Yours truly,

W. LAMPRECHT.

There is another letter, commencing on page 7, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

FARMERS UNION COOPERATIVE EXCHANGE,
Hartington, Nebr., September 29, 1930.

Mr. H. G. KEENEY,
President Farmers Union, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR MR. KEENEY: I want to tell you about our experience with the revenue agents sent out by the Omaha office. Through the representative of the Farmers Union, Mr. French, we filed our claim for exemption last year and were granted exemption in October, 1929.

In April, 1930, two revenue men called upon us and submitted an affidavit for my signature. The affidavit had been made out before they had talked with me, and I was told that I had signed an affidavit that they could not verify the amounts upon the books. They said that if I signed the affidavit they had I would be released from any liability of false information on the other affidavit, and I was advised by them to sign the one presented by them.

The amounts on the affidavit that I did sign were based upon estimates of the amount of business done with Farmers Union members and stockholders of our association. These percentages were furnished Mr. French and used by him upon our questionnaire filed for the purpose of claiming exemption and were based upon a 75 per cent basis of the business done by our association.

I refused to sign the affidavits, as I thought that as long as Mr. French was handling our claim he should be advised; and I know that if I had signed the affidavit they presented, it would have been used to cancel our claim for exemption that had already been granted to our association.

I do not see why revenue agents should try to get us to sign any papers that we do not know anything about, and I think you and our State board did the right thing in making arrangements with some one like Mr. French who can represent us in such matters.

Because of the action taken by Mr. French we are exempt from paying income taxes and are now waiting for our refund claim to be paid.

Yours truly, H. C. BREDEMEYER, Manager.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the farmers in that State employed, at considerable expense, a Mr. French to go out there and to make investigation and see what was wrong and why they could not get their exemption. I am going to read from the testimony of Mr. French to show his qualifications for the work:

Mr. FRENCH. My name is Arthur S. French. I am a certified public accountant, president of Arthur S. French & Co., home office at the Munsey Building, Washington. I am a public accountant with 25 years' experience, 14 of which have been with certified public accountants degree.

As far as my experience goes, pertaining to the matters before the subcommittee, in 1921 Secretary Wallace appointed me as general auditor of the packers and stockyards administration in the Department of Agriculture. That job gave me full control over all accounting work in all of the matters of the packers and stockyards and livestock commission public markets. As the packers and stockyards act made a special dispensation with regard to cooperative organizations, we were forced to study the details of the cooperatives, in allowing them to pay rebates. For that reason my experience with the department gave me a very wide touch with cooperative procedure; and upon the death of Secretary Wallace I resigned and went back into public accounting practice, specializing in the work of the cooperative associations.

That was the man, Mr. President, whom these people employed. I do not know what they had to pay him, but probably it was quite a sum. One would not expect him to go over there, halfway across the continent, and spend probably two or three months in going around examining these associations in order to find out what was the matter and why it was they could not get their exemptions, without adequate compensation.

Mr. President, it seemed to me—and that is the impression of the committee, I think—that some employees of the Government, desirous of showing some reason for their retention in the Government service, were anxious to find fault of a technical nature, and in many cases they may have been technically right, with the manner in which the books of the cooperatives were kept.

During the last summer I had this matter up with the cooperative associations of the country. I had been importuned to do something. As we all know, everyone was busy; but I took the matter up with the bureau. I had Mr. French and Mr. Keeney here and went over the situation with them. It took a good deal of my time to familiarize myself first with the law and then with the facts in the case. Mr. French said that if he could meet with the bureau's representatives, if they would take him into their confidence and sit around the table, he thought we could adjust it all.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator. I, too, thought so, and I made an arrangement for such a meeting. They had rejected many of the claims for exemption. I asked them to reopen those claims, and then to notify Mr. French, the representative of these organizations, and let him examine their records; let him sit in with them and talk the matter over. As I said in the letters I wrote to them, "I believe if you will do that we can adjust this matter satisfactorily." They did reopen the claims at my request. They made that agreement with me in black and white by correspondence. I left Washington when the last session of Congress adjourned with the idea that this was all going to be settled and that there would be no difficulty about it. I was surprised to learn that they did not let Mr. French in on the readjudication of the cases; that they took them up without notifying him. All they did was to reopen them at my request; and when Congress adjourned they passed on them again, and denied the exemption in all cases. That is the reason I introduced the resolution.

After the subcommittee entered upon the investigation, as the members of the subcommittee will agree, and proceeded with the taking of testimony, with representatives of the Government present and Mr. French representing the association, an agreement was entered into that we would stop taking testimony and that the representatives of the department, whose names I have read, should call Mr. French in, and they would see if they could not reach an understanding as to the construction of this law and whatever would be necessary in order to give exemption to the cooperatives.

Two or three days after we adjourned, with that understanding, I got a letter from the bureau calling my attention to a statute that we had passed which kept these records secret, and which provided that no body had a right to examine them except members of the Finance Committee of the Senate and members of the House Ways and Means Committee, and also members of any committee specifically designated for that particular purpose by either branch of Congress. Of course, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was not so designated. We notified these men at a hearing that we would appoint Mr. French as our representative to look over the accounts and documents on file in order to see what, if any, reason they had for refusing exemption, and if their reason was good, that we would try to remedy the situation by a proper amendment that would rectify the error.

When I read that letter I realized that the committee were up against an impossibility; that the Agricultural Committee had no right to examine these records; that the bureau really had no right to show them to us; and so we were unable to go any farther with our investigation. But in this great Government, where Congress has undertaken by law to give exemption to certain cooperative associations, when there is a dispute now as to what is wrong, as to why they shall not get those exemptions, and we want to examine the records of our own country, even Members of the Senate are denied the privilege.

We are to blame for that. That is part of the secret government. We have conferred that sacred right only upon the exalted members of the Finance Committee. The members of the Agricultural Committee, having to do with agriculture, having to do with farming, having to do with organizations of this kind, have to stand outside. We can not go in; and in those secret archives are the records that have denied to these cooperative organizations all over the United States the right to the exemption that the law intended to give them.

I yield now to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I sought to interrupt the able Senator only to say that to my mind he has clearly and distinctly made out his case. I shall support his amendment; and I am pleased that he has availed himself of this opportunity to comment upon some of the acts, approaching tyranny, committed by the Federal income-tax officials.

One of the reasons why the income tax is losing its popularity is that many of the citizens of the United States have begun to look upon that bureau not as an agency willing to assist them and give them sound advice, but rather as an agency liable at any moment to entrap them, mangle them, and mulct them out of their earnings, if not send them to the penitentiary, when no misdeed was willfully attempted or contemplated.

The Senator has done well in excoriating those who perpetrated this wrong upon the farmers, and I am going to support the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

It is the desire of these associations to get just as many members as possible, and the latter part of this amendment—the only part that we put in—provides that the profit coming to nonmembers shall be retained in the hands of the association, and that the nonmember entitled to the profit can utilize the accumulation of the funds to pay for a share that will admit him into the association.

Unless Senators have some questions, I do not believe I have anything further to say.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that this is the first I have heard of this matter; and after listening to the Senator I am perfectly willing that the amendment shall go into conference, and then we can attend to the details of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want this amendment to go into this bill with the idea that it is going out in conference.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that.

Mr. NORRIS. I know; but that happens so often. The Senator said he was willing to go into conference with it. If there is any objection to it, I should like to meet it now.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the first I have heard of it, so I do not know; but I think it is worthy of most serious consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it comes down to this: Are we wrong in trying to give exemption to cooperative organizations? The exemption is based on the theory that they make no profit. It is all returned to the members.

So far as I know, no one has ever denied the righteousness of the principle that purely cooperative organizations should not pay an income tax, because they have no profit. It all goes back to the members, who are assessed the same as everybody else on this kind of income, as on everything else. If that principle is right, then this amendment is necessary to give effect to our law.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has ably stated the merits of this amendment, and I trust that the Senate will adopt it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is in the Chamber now, and I should like to recur to page 16, line 10.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to that amendment which is now lying on the table.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following amendment to the committee amendment beginning on page 16, line 10:

On page 16, line 13, strike out "individual for personal services" and insert "director or employee of a corporation for personal services to such corporation," so as to read:

(e) There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the amount by which the compensation (including salaries, commissions, emoluments, and rewards) of any director or employee of a corporation for personal services to such corporation exceeds compensation at the rate of $75,000 per year, a tax of 80 per cent of such amount. The tax imposed by this subsection shall be in lieu of all other taxes under this title in respect of such amount.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that amendment simply conforms the language to the original intention when the amendment was submitted to the Finance Committee. It limits it to the directors, executive officers, and employees of corporations. Through an inadvertence on the part of the experts, who were overworked at the time, it was made applicable to partnerships and professional men, as well as corporation officers and directors.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it the intention to pass upon this matter now?

Mr. GORE. I assume so.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not familiar with the facts myself, but some Senator—I am not sure who it was—called my attention to this particular amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is the only one who has ever spoken to me in relation to it.

Mr. NORRIS. If it is the $75,000 amendment, I should like, if it is agreed to now, to have the understanding that if the Senators who are interested, and who are not present, want to have it reconsidered, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly hope it will not be agreed to, but if it is agreed to——

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean this is a committee amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the committee reported it.

Mr. NORRIS. But this is an amendment to the committee amendment, as I understand.

Mr. GORE. The amendment just read; yes, sir. I may state that I was the author of the amendment, and presented it before the Finance Committee. It was agreed to by the Finance Committee, and is now one of the committee amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am called out of the Chamber, and I know of several other Senators who are in conference right now; and I should like to have an understanding before I go, if I can—I can not even wait to hear this discussion—that the action of the Senate may be reconsidered later if those Senators desire it.

Mr. GORE. I am sure the Senator from Nebraska will favor this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I probably shall. I do not know as to that.

Mr. GORE. In fact, this is the amendment I discussed with the Senator from Nebraska a few days ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 22, line 21, after the word "equity," it is proposed to insert:

The amount by which the compensation (including salary) of any person for personal services exceeds compensation at the rate of $75,000 per year shall not be deductible under this subsection.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the same amendment as the other.

Mr. GORE. This amendment, in a sense, is a companion to the one just adopted. The two are related to each other, and I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. They are related to each other; and, of course, having adopted the first one, the other one would naturally be adopted as well.

Mr. GORE. The other one goes in as a matter of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. I wish to have printed in the RECORD at this point, and in connection with these amendments, a document gotten out by the minority stockholders of the Bethlehem Steel Co., and I hope the Senate will indulge me in one word in that connection.

This has particular reference to an evil that has grown up in this country in the last few years—an evil which in large measure has destroyed confidence in the securities of many of the great corporations, and destroyed the confidence of stockholders in their own directors and officers.

I have in mind particularly the Bethlehem Steel Co. In 1917 or 1918 it embarked upon a policy of paying bonuses. From 1918 to 1928, inclusive, that concern paid more than $30,000,000 to its officers and directors in bonuses, and paid only $40,000,000 to its common-stock holders.

From 1925 to 1928, inclusive, that company paid out $6,000,000 in bonuses, and paid no dividends whatever on its common stock.

During those four years, when no dividend was paid out on common stock, $3,000,000 in bonuses was paid to the president of that company.

In 1929, $1,600,000 was paid to the president of the Bethlehem Steel Co.

In 1931, $1,000,000 and more was paid to the president of that concern in the form of a bonus, even though the company did not earn its dividend that year.

It is to correct evils of that sort that these amendments have been offered; and they are part of a larger scheme which I have in mind, which will ultimately restore faith on the part of the stockholders of this country in the corporations of the country; I mean some system patterned after that which prevails in England, where the people know what they are buying, and are assured of getting value received in exchange for their money.

Sooner or later Congress must adopt some system, applying it to concerns engaged in interstate commerce, that will destroy practices of this sort and establish confidence in the minds of the stockholders and in the minds of the public.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROTECTIVE COMMITTEE FOR STOCKHOLDERS OF BETHLEHEM STEEL CORPORATION,
March 20, 1931.

To the Common and Preferred Stock Holders of Bethlehem Steel Corporation:

This letter is addressed to you upon the subject of the Bethlehem bonus system.

The undersigned were organized as a protective committee through the action of a group of former stockholders of the Midvale Steel & Ordnance Co., who became Bethlehem common-stock holders upon the acquisition in 1923 of Midvale by Bethlehem.

This group of stockholders felt that the facts relating to the Bethlehem bonus system disclosed in the Youngstown suit, required the concerted action of stockholders for the protection of their interests, and it was for this purpose that the protective committee was thus organized under a protective agreement dated the 12th day of November, 1930.

This committee thereupon employed counsel and investigations were made as to the facts and the law relating to these bonuses. The committee, having been advised that the bonuses were unwarranted, decided to address the stockholders generally. Since early in January, when the committee decided to make its representation general, it has been actively endeavoring to obtain a list of the stockholders for the purpose of permitting the stockholders who had originally brought about the organization of the committee, to address their fellow stockholders. Judicial proceedings, which eventually had to be brought by the committee, have finally resulted in the corporation acceding to the demand for this list. Although numerous stockholders, who have heard through the public press of the activities of the committee, have come forward and joined the original group of stockholders and authorized the committee to act for them, the representation of the committee is still comparatively small for the reason that until now for want of the list the committee has not been in a position to address the stockholders.

Although the bonuses have thus been made the subject of inquiry and criticism by the group of stockholders represented by the committee and although a suit has been brought by other stockholders in the New Jersey Chancery Court to obtain redress in respect to the bonuses (in which suit the committee has intervened), the directors of the corporation, nevertheless (while denying to the committee access to the list of stockholders to which they were clearly entitled), have seen fit to send to the stockholders a letter of Chairman Schwab under date of March 2, 1931, together with a notice of the annual meeting to be held on April 14, 1931, stating as one of the special purposes of such meeting "The approval and ratification of the administration of the bonus system since 1917" and have solicited proxies running to Mr. Schwab and several of his fellow directors authorizing them to vote at such meeting in approval of their own acts since 1917 in respect of the bonuses. In other words, the directors have attempted to secure a vote of immunity while denying to the other side any opportunity to be heard. Nothing could be more unfair.

Chairman Schwab, in his letter of March 2, attempts to make it appear that the practices of the directors as to the bonuses have been known to the stockholders. This is contrary to the fact. It has been the regular yearly practice of the directors to take proxies authorizing them to vote at the annual meetings in favor of the ratification of their acts for the preceding year. If the bonuses had been the subject matter of disclosure to the stockholders during these years, it would be pointless to ask for proxies authorizing a vote in ratification of the bonuses since 1917.

A careful scrutiny of the annual reports of the corporation for the period in question will show that there is not in any of them the least mention of bonuses nor could the most astute analyst have gleaned from any of the earnings statements or balance sheets accompanying these annual reports anything relating to the compensation of officials, which subject is submerged in one bare item of "operating expense."

Not only were the bonuses not disclosed but they were studiously concealed. The annual reports deal in the text as well as in the schedules of figures at length and in detail with the pension system of the corporation which involved an expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars a year but no mention whatsoever is made of bonuses which run into millions annually.

The plain fact of the matter is that not voluntary disclosure has been made of this bonus system and that it was only when the Bethlehem officials were recently cross-examined in the Youngstown suit that the facts became known. You are a stockholder. When and how did you first learn of the extent and character of this bonus system?

The stockholders who came into Bethlehem through mergers or acquisitions of other corporations, such as Midvale, Lackawanna, and others, have a special grievance. They were not informed, when requested to exchange their stock, of the bonus system. The effect of this was that without their knowledge the earnings contributed by their corporations became subject to these huge bonuses.

The amount of the bonuses is most unseemly and improper. The president, Mr. Grace, it now appears, received in the year 1929 a bonus of $1,623,753 and in the year 1930 a bonus of $1,015,591. During the period in which these bonuses for executive officers have been in force, and up to the close of 1928, there has been taken out of the corporate treasury for this purpose $31,878,255 as against $40,886,996 paid to common-stock holders. In other words, the amount paid as bonuses is about 80 per cent of the amount distributed as common dividends to the owners of the equity of the property. In the four years 1925–1928, inclusive, during which not a dollar of dividends was paid to the common-stock holders, $6,800,524 in bonuses was paid to these few favored directors and other executives. The president alone took $3,105,963 as bonuses during these years. Although the company in 1930 failed to earn its dividends it nevertheless paid a bonus of $1,015,591 in that year to its president.

Mr. Schwab, at page 17 of his letter, states: "There is, of course, no relation between compensation to executives and the payment of dividends." He then goes on to point out that the question of the payment of dividends is in the sound discretion of the directors. If the condition of the corporation is such that the directors in the fair exercise of discretion should withhold from the owners of the property any share of the earnings, it must, of course, follow that fair exercise of discretion would compel them to avoid paying inordinate bonuses to favored directors and other executives.

Mr. Schwab's attempt to, justify this bonus system is chiefly upon the ground, as he claims, that the services of expert executives for large American corporations can not be effectively retained without the payment of excessive rewards. This we believe is very far removed from the truth. It is undoubtedly a fact that, for example, the chief executives of all of our great American railway systems and the chief executives of our great public utilities do not receive as compensation more than a small fraction of the amount paid to the president of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. It is preposterous to suggest that the president of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation has shown himself to be more capable of running his job than, for example, the president of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, or the president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. Nor can it be claimed that the successful management of a manufacturing business requires any higher degree of ability, if as high, as that necessary in railway management or public-utility management.

It is true, as Mr. Schwab states, that, under modern conditions, the management of large American corporations is generally entrusted to men who are not the proprietors of the business which belongs to thousands of stockholders, who in turn have no active part in the management. But we believe that Mr. Schwab is out of step with his times in contending that men entrusted with the management of such corporations must, in order to give competent and loyal service, receive such inordinate compensation as has been paid to the Bethlehem officials. Executives of our hundreds or thousands of large American industrial, railway, utility, financial, and other corporations constitute in a sense a new profession, and it is an unfair indictment of this profession and of American business men in general to suggest that the thousands of high executives employed in this country in the management of corporations as large and as well conducted as Bethlehem Steel Corporation are not giving their most efficient and loyal service, because indeed, they are not being compensated at the rate of $1,000,000 a year.

We wish also to call to the attention of the stockholders that, besides this bonus of Bethlehem Steel Corporation for the exclusive benefit of 10 or 12 favored directors and other officials, the cost of which is indicated by the figures above quoted, there is, as shown by the letter of Mr. Schwab, and by other facts which have come to the attention of the committee, an additional bonus system which is separately conducted in the various operating subsidiaries of Bethlehem Steel Corporation. Up to the present the committee has not been able to ascertain any of the detailed facts in respect to these other systems, such as the amount of their cost and whether these same officials also share in them by virtue of holding offices in the subsidiary companies. These facts will be developed, no doubt, in the course of the litigation which is now pending and in which, as above stated, the committee has intervened.

Mr. Schwab's letter refers to a by-law adopted by the stockholders in 1918 purporting to authorize the board of directors to administer a bonus system limited to "8 per cent of the consolidated net earnings after deducting all fixed charges and an amount equal to annual dividends on preferred stock outstanding but before deducting depreciation." It will be noted that the by-law does not provide for 8 per cent bonuses, but merely fixes 8 per cent as the maximum limit. Even if the bonuses had been kept within this limit, the directors were in duty bound to apply the rule of reason and propriety in determining these bonuses and the division thereof. The payment to a chosen 10 or 12 executives, including several of the directors, of highly excessive bonuses is not a proper exercise of the directors' discretion. That the directors kept within the maximum limit does not excuse the extravagant, unjustifiable distributions.

It is believed that a complete analysis will eventually disclose that even the maximum limit was exceeded. At best the by-law was ill-conceived in that it provides that the 8 per cent limitation shall be computed before instead of after depreciation. The annual reports of the Bethlehem Co. show write-offs aggregating over $190,000,000 embodied in a single item under the caption of "depreciation, obsolescence, and depletion." In so far as the aggregate amount of the bonuses was determined by calculating 8 per cent of the earnings before deducting obsolescence and depletion the bonus exceeded even the maximum limit permitted by the by-law. The obsolescence of the plant, especially the wartime plant, and the depletion of the mining properties must have made up a large part of this $190,000,000.

In regard to Mr. Schwab's comparison of the ratio of administrative, selling, and general expense to total sales wherein a more favorable showing is claimed to be made for Bethlehem than that obtaining for United States Steel or Youngstown, the committee would wish first to hear comments of the two last-named companies before accepting Mr. Schwab's claims as final. Computations of cost are frequently misleading unless all of the facts and circumstances are set forth.

If you agree with the committee and the stockholders who have already authorized it to act for them that the bonus system of the corporation should be put a stop to or at least modified to one within reason, we would ask that you sign the inclosed power of attorney and return it in the addressed envelope herewith also inclosed.

The stockholders who have already authorized the committee to act for them have all contributed at the rate of 25 cents a share toward the expenses of the committee. The directors have the corporate treasury at their command. The committee looks to the stockholders for the necessary financial support in representing them and taking the necessary concerted action properly to protect their interests. The committee was originally organized to act only for common-stock holders, as such stockholders, the owners of the equity in the business, are more directly affected by the bonuses than are the preferred-stock holders. Since, however, the directors have now solicited proxies of both preferred and common stock holders authorizing them to ratify the administration of the bonus system since 1917, the committee has amended the protective agreement so as to make its representation apply both to preferred and common stock holders and, therefore, seeks the proxies of both. The committee would ask, especially from the common-stock holders, that all who feel that they can lend their financial as well as their moral support send their contributions to the committee at the rate of 25 cents a share. Checks may be drawn to the order of Henry B. H. Ripley, treasurer.

We wish to call particular attention to the fact that the inclosed proxy does not seek authority to act at the meeting except upon the question of bonuses.

Very truly yours,

HENRY B. H. RIPLEY,
SAMUEL D. HOPKINS,
EDWIN D. LEVINSON,
Protective Committee for Stockholders of Bethlehem Steel Corporation.

Special caution: Be sure to date your proxy. The last-dated proxy is controlling.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment passed over, at the request of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], is on page 145.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to take up now the amendment on page 31, beginning on line 8 and going to line 2 on page 33, limitation on stock losses. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is in the Chamber now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, the committee proposes to strike out lines 8 to 24, both inclusive, and on page 32, lines 1 to 7, both inclusive, in the following words:

(r) Limitation on stock losses: Losses from sales or exchanges of stocks and bonds (as defined in subsection (v) of this section) which are not capital assets (as defined in section 101) shall be allowed only to the extent of the gains from such sales or exchanges. This subsection shall not apply to a dealer in securities in respect of transactions in the ordinary course of his business with his customers.

(s) Same capital assets: Losses from sales or exchanges of stocks and bonds (as defined in subsection (v) of this section) which are capital assets (as defined in section 101) shall be allowed only to the extent of the gains from such sales or exchanges.

(t) Same offsets:

(1) Losses disallowed as a deduction by subsection (r) shall, for the purposes of this title, be considered as losses from sales or exchanges of stocks or bonds which are capital assets.

(2) Losses disallowed as a deduction by subsection (s) shall, for the purposes of this title, be considered as losses from sales or exchanges of stocks and bonds which are not capital assets. In no case shall this paragraph operate to make the tax less than a tax computed without regard to the provisions of subsections (r) and (s) and this subsection.

And to insert:

(r) Limitation on stock losses:

(1) Losses from sales or exchanges of stocks and bonds (as defined in subsection (t) of this section) which are not capital assets (as defined in section 101) shall be allowed only to the extent of the gains from such sales or exchanges.

(2) Losses disallowed as a deduction by paragraph (1), computed without regard to any losses sustained during the preceding taxable year, shall, to an amount not in excess of the taxpayer's net income for the taxable year, be considered for the purposes of this title as losses sustained in the succeeding taxable year from sales or exchanges of stocks or bonds which are not capital assets.

(3) This subsection shall not apply to a dealer in securities in respect of transactions in the ordinary course of his business with his customers, nor to a bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. It has been approved by the Treasury Department as I am advised.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The junior Senator from Utah offers the following amendment: On page 33, after line 2, insert:

Nor to persons carrying on banking business where the receipts of deposits constitute a major part of such business in respect of transactions in the ordinary course of such banking business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I submit a statement to accompany the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The proposed amendment is necessary in order to avoid discrimination against the unincorporated banking institutions of the country and to place them upon the same footing as incorporated banks and trust companies with respect to their business losses.

The bill as introduced in the Senate (sec. 23 (r)), provides that losses from the sale or exchange of securities shall be allowed only to the extent of gains from such sales or exchanges, but provides that this shall not apply to dealers in securities nor to incorporated banks and trust companies. The Senate bill thus recognizes that the limitation upon security losses should not be applied to the banking business but fails to include unincorporated banks when there is no reason whatever for distinguishing incorporated from unincorporated banks.

The resources of all banks doing a deposit business are subject to fluctuations because of varying deposits and withdrawals. Banks must necessarily maintain readily available assets to meet the fluctuations in deposits and at the same time, as a part of their regular business, must employ their resources so as to obtain a reasonable return. To maintain this secondary reserve, banks invest a part of their resources in readily marketable securities. Unavoidably, there will be losses as well as profits in this phase of the banking business, and these losses, which are incurred in the ordinary course of the banking business should manifestly be treated as any other business losses and be deductible from the ordinary income of the business.

The present provisions of the Senate bill allow incorporated banks to deduct losses from the sale or exchange of securities even though there are no gains in the same year from such transactions. Unincorporated banks receiving substantial deposits carry on identically the same kind of business as incorporated banks and trust companies. Unincorporated banks maintain secondary reserves in the form of readily marketable securities and may sustain losses upon such securities in the regular course of their banking business, as in the case of incorporated banks. The reasons justifying the exemption in the case of incorporated banks apply equally to unincorporated banks. To grant relief to one and deny it to another would seem to be discrimination, imposes an unjust and unreasonable burden upon a well-recognized class of banks, and presents a constitutional question under the decision of the Supreme Court in Quaker City Cab Co. v. Pennsylvania (277 U. S. 389), which held unconstitutional a Pennsylvania tax law discriminating between incorporated and unincorporated concerns carrying on the same business.

The amendment now proposed is so phrased as to permit the exemption of unincorporated banks without opening the door to evasion. Only those banks that do a substantial deposit business are exempted under the amendment, since it is limited to banks "where the receipt of deposits constitutes a major part" of the banking business. In order to prevent the individual members of an unincorporated bank from obtaining the benefits of the amendment, with respect to their personal transactions, the amendment specifically limits the relief to "transactions in the ordinary course of such banking business."

The proposed amendment, therefore, will avoid discrimination and assure equality of treatment to unincorporated banks without permitting evasion.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I propose the amendment, which I send to the desk, to the amendment of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 32, strike out lines 22 to 24, down to and including the word "customers," and insert in lieu thereof:

(8) This subsection shall not apply to a dealer in securities (as to stocks and bonds acquired for resale to customers) in respect of transactions in the ordinary course of his business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the department has no objection to that amendment, and I do not see any objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 315, between lines 12 and 13, the Senator from Florida offers an amendment, to be known as section 1106½, to read as follows:

The existence of a closing agreement shall not constitute a bar to a refund or credit of an overpayment of internal-revenue taxes in any case where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that an overpayment has been made; nor, in any such case where a closing agreement has been heretofore entered into under such section, shall the expiration of any period of limitations constitute a bar to any such refund or credit if claim therefor is filed within two years from the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sincerely hope the Senate will not agree to that amendment. It is a very dangerous suggestion, and would mean that the closing of accounts would be done away with and there would never be an end to them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the Government should be put in the same position in which individuals find themselves. If an adjustment has been made and an agreement has been reached and afterwards the Treasury admits that, by reason of fraud or mistake or some misrepresentation or mistake of fact, there has been an overpayment, does not question it, and it is proven, as the amendment specifies, there should be a reopening of the account.

Mr. SMOOT. Wherever there is fraud, and that can be proven, the account can be opened at any time.

Mr. FLETCHER. There may not be actual fraud. Let me give a specific case, of which I happen to know, and I will close the whole discussion with it.

Let us assume that a man has stock in a certain corporation, and transfers that stock. We will say that "A" owns stock and transfers it to "B," and has an agreement with "B" that 50 per cent of the dividends on the stock are to be paid to "A."

A Treasury agent adjusts the matter of income on the dividends which have been paid, finding, of course, that the dividends have been paid to "B," but under the agreement half of the dividends have been transmitted to "A." The agent insists that "B" pay the entire income tax on the dividends because the stock stands of record in the name of "B" and "B" pays the tax on the entire dividends.

In the case to which I am referring A lives in a State different from that in which B resides. A does not know anything about the settlement made with B, and pays a tax on the part of the dividends sent to him. The Government is advised of the fact that B has already paid the tax on the dividends, but the Government says, "No; we have no authority to adjust this, because the tax was paid under the law, and there is no way by which the account can be reopened."

The amendment I have offered simply authorizes the Government to reopen an account where a mistake like that has been made and where the Government concedes there was a mistake. In the case I suppose there is a double payment of the tax, the tax paid by a taxpayer in one State and by another taxpayer in another State. The Government has the money, twice paid in. Is it honest, is it just, and is it right that the Government should not adjust that matter and return the overpayment? The officials say they can not do so under the present law.

There would not be any fraud in a case like that, but there would be a transaction between two people and the Government, each one being ignorant of the settlement made by the other. The payments were actually made, and the Government admits having received two payments of the same tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Government is in exactly the same position the individual is in. The Government could not recover after the time had expired. There must be some time when the accounts are closed. The Government is put upon the same basis with the taxpayer. The same law applies to the Government that applies to the taxpayer, and I can not see any injustice in it. It seems to me the amendment is a dangerous one and should not be agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, where an individual comes to an understanding with the Government as to how much a tax is, and agrees to pay it and does pay it, he must take the consequences. But, as I have said, there are circumstances where one party is charged with a tax and another party is charged with the same tax, and one makes a settlement which the other knows nothing about, and the Government receives double payment, under which the Government should return the overpayment, when it is admitted and conceded that there is an overpayment, and there is no question of doubt at all.

This amendment provides that the Government must be satisfied that the overpayment has been made, and that within two years a claim must be set up. Otherwise a claim would be barred. I grant that there ought to be a time set, and I have amended my own amendment to cover that.

Mr. KING. Let us have a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, this simply means that the Senate insists that the Government of the United States, because it is the Government, shall follow—

> The simple plan,
> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

It is admitted that two payments are made of the same tax. That is provided for in the amendment. Yet it is said that the Government is to keep the overpayment, because the money is in the Treasury, and the Government does not propose to pay it out. It is no more honest for the Government to do that than it would be for an individual to do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 145——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has been called out of the Chamber. He wanted to be here when this amendment is considered, and therefore I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Nebraska offers the following amendment:

On page 257, after line 11, insert the following new section:
"SEC. —. There is hereby imposed upon energy sold by privately owned operating electrical power companies a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the price for which so sold, payable from net income but not otherwise."

On page 262, line 6, after "article," insert "(other than electrical energy)."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there has been no hearing on that amendment. The committee has not considered it at all.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, if the committee has not considered the amendment, it was not because the amendment was not before the committee. As a consequence, the only place where a hearing can be had is here on the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree that the Senator has a right to offer the amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is an important amendment, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I have offered what I regard as a very important amendment. If adopted, it will add $50,000,000 of revenue provided for in the pending bill. I shall not take much time to discuss the amendment. I have condensed into a very short statement the matter which I propose to offer in support of it.

The production and distribution of electric energy is undoubtedly the most prosperous industry in the United States to-day. Instead of feeling the pinch of the depression of the last two years, as has been the lot of most other industries, it has enjoyed an increase in income as compared with 1929, while benefiting from the fall in cost of labor, coal, copper, and other supplies.

Assuming the gross revenue of all power plants throughout the country for 1929 as 100, the revenue for 1930 was 102.7 and for 1931, 101.5. In short, the first year of the depression was the power industries' banner year, while 1931 was but 1.2 per cent behind, and yet 1½ per cent ahead of 1929.

As evidence that this prosperity has not been confined to particular sections of the country, but has been general, consider power plants operating under such widely different economic conditions as are found in Washington, D. C., and in Omaha, Nebr., the latter city located in the distressed agricultural region of the Midwest.

In the case of the Potomac Electric Power Co., serving Washington, we find that its gross income for 1931 was 8 per cent in excess of that for the boom year of 1929. Furthermore, that the company has enjoyed an average annual net income during the last seven years of more than a million dollars in excess of all costs of operation, maintenance, depreciation, taxes, and the 7½ per cent return on its rate base—now $55,122,000—allowed by the Public Service Commission. In 1930 this excess was $1,650,000.

In this connection it should be borne in mind that the maximum charge for service in Washington in 1931 was more than 2 cents less per kilowatt-hour than the average maximum rate prevailing throughout the country. For that year, 1931, the maximum rate charged small domestic consumers was 4.2 cents per kilowatt-hour. For this year, 1932, the rate has been reduced further to 3.9 cents.

In the case of the power plant in Omaha, a city directly dependent upon distressed agriculture for its prosperity, the power company's gross income instead of decreasing in 1931 was more by 14 per cent than in 1929, while the increase in net income was in excess of 30 per cent. Yet the maximum rate in Omaha is 5.5 cents per kilowatt-hour, or more than a cent less than the average for the country.

In a recent interview, Mr. Insull, president of the Midwest Utilities Co., an electric holding corporation, which recently went into the hands of receivers, attested as to the general prosperity of the power industry by stating in effect that the operating power companies controlled by Midwest had their best year in 1931.

The phenomenal development of power holding companies, even to the third and fourth degree, which has been in progress during the past two decades or more, has created a prevalent and abiding suspicion that not only the investing public but also the consuming public was being imposed upon by the power industry through the issuance of watered securities based upon excessive rates of service. However, the magnitude of such inflations and operating profits can be adequately realized only by a study of concrete examples. This is now possible because of data rendered available by the Federal Trade Commission as a result of its recent investigations of the so-called Power Trust; and the following facts are drawn largely from that commission's report on the Nebraska Power Co., serving Omaha, Council Bluffs, and a number of other communities within a radius of some 50 miles.

NEBRASKA POWER CO.—HOW IT GOUGES CONSUMERS

An inventory of the Omaha electric light plant in 1903 under the direction of its officials listed physical property valued at $794,000, while the stocks and bonds outstanding totaled $1,201,000.

In the same year this capitalization of $1,201,000 was increased to $3,831,300, though less than $66,000 in money or property was received by the company for the additional securities—a write up of some $2,564,300.

Fourteen years later, in 1917, the stock of the Omaha company was accumulated by the Electric Bond & Share Co. for the account of its subsidiary, the American Power & Light Co., and the property turned over to the Nebraska Power Co., a new corporation organized by Electric Bond & Share.

The increased capitalization of the new company resulted in again writing up the value of the property—this time by the amount of $7,067,363—though not a dollar in property or cash was received by the new company for the additional securities.

By the end of 1920 the capitalization of Nebraska Power had reached $17,800,000, of which $9,631,663, or more than 54 per cent, was represented by the write up of 1903 plus the write up of 1917.

The consequences of accumulating the stock of the Omaha plant and recapitalizing under the name of the Nebraska Power Co. were: First, that American Power & Light acquired the common stock of Nebraska Power—consisting now of about 1,000,000 no-par-value shares—at an ultimate cost of some $766,000; and, second, that Electric Bond & Share, though the expenses it incurred as a result of this transaction were but $15,000, exacted a fee of $1,247,971 in cash and securities. Thus it is evident that had Electric Bond & Share been satisfied with a net fee of a quarter of a million dollars, its subsidiary, American Power & Light, would have acquired its million shares of common stock not only without cost but with a profit of $217,000 besides.

Nor is this all the profit for Electric Bond & Share that has followed in this case. From 1918 to 1930, inclusive, Nebraska Power has paid Electric Bond & Share and affiliates for supervision and other services $1,431,524—more than $100,000 per annum. This is a method employed by holding companies for milking a subsidiary company.

Neither does this liberality end with the Electric Bond & Share. Whereas Nebraska Power does not maintain a public relations department as such, it did expend $90,000 for advertising in 1930 of which about $60,000 went to newspapers. Moreover, nine citizens of Omaha, prominent members of civic organizations, were maintained on the board of directors, eight of whom were granted the privilege of purchasing and holding 5,000 shares, and one director 2,000 shares of common stock, at 50 cents per share. However, upon retiring from the board, each must resell his stock to American Power & Light, but at a promised advance of 50 per cent. In the meantime, a director enjoys the common dividends on his holdings. These have been running about $4,000 per annum on a 5,000-share block of stock. In addition, each director receives $30 for every board meeting attended.

The $35,000 which these nine directors cost American Power & Light and Nebraska Power each year, is undoubtedly deemed a purely public-relations expense, inasmuch as these directors do little directing, the real power of the board being exercised by an executive committee composed of two vice presidents of the company, also officers of American Power & Light, who live in New York, and the company's president, a resident of Omaha.

The liberality of Nebraska Power, disclosed by its patronage of the public press, by its treatment of local directors, and by the fees it allows for supervision, suggests how easy is money with that company, due to the swollen profits which it is allowed to enjoy. Such profits are due to the fact that the power industry has been a beneficiary rather than a victim of the depression, inasmuch as rate schedules have remained largely constant while revenues have increased and expenses fallen.

In the case of the Nebraska Power Co. a maximum rate of 5½ cents per kilowatt-hour to small consumers has been in effect more than 10 years, yet its cost of generation and distribution fell about 44 per cent from 1920 to 1930, and in 1931 the company's gross revenue, as previously stated, exceeded that of the boom year of 1929 by 14 per cent, while its net income increased more than 30 per cent.

To many a maximum rate of 5½ cents may seem low. It was low in 1921, and is now in the neighborhood of 1½ cents below the average for the country. But to-day 5½ cents is excessive, while the higher rates obtaining elsewhere amount to positive robbery.

This is clearly demonstrated by the dividend and earnings record of Nebraska Power. As previously stated, American Power & Light, a subsidiary of Electric Bond & Share, acquired the million shares of common stock of Nebraska Power as the result of an investment of some $766,000, which sum was in effect part of the fee of $1,247,971 exacted by Electric Bond & Share for acquiring, recapitalizing, and transferring the control of the Omaha plant to American Power & Light. Here it should be recalled that the expenses incurred in this transaction by Electric Bond & Share totaled but some $15,000. Of course, this million shares of common stock, so far as the public is concerned, represents nothing but distilled water. Nevertheless the people of Omaha and vicinity—I want Senators to mark this—contributed actual dividends on this $766,000 of 48 per cent in 1924, 48½ per cent in 1925, 66½ per cent in 1926, approximately 97 per cent in 1927, and 96½ per cent in 1928. Since 1928, after paying all costs of operation, maintenance, depreciation, taxes, fixed charges, and dividends on preferred stock, there remained, in 1929, for this investment of $766,000, 191 per cent; in 1930, 226 per cent; and in 1931, 250 per cent.

In 1931, had American Power & Light been willing to limit the earnings for its common stock of Nebraska Power to 50 per cent of its investment therein of $766,000, the charges to Nebraska Power's consumers for service of $6,823,000 could have been reduced by $1,536,000, or an average of more than $23 per consumer for that year.

Unfortunately, public officials throughout the country whose duty it is to protect the public from contributing such huge profits seem incapable of relieving their constituents of such unjust burdens. This is largely due, without doubt, to the barbed-wire entanglements of legal regulation by which public-utility corporations are protected. However, where public officials avoid the line of least resistance and determinedly fight for justice to consumers, public sentiment ultimately accomplishes results where regulation utterly fails.

In the case of Omaha, unfortunately, such regulation as is possible is not in effect. The regulatory body is the city council, and no attempt has been made to compute a rate base for Nebraska power and correct it annually for the purpose of determining and putting into effect just and reasonable rates from time to time, as is done in the District of Columbia and in other jurisdictions where regulatory bodies efficiently function. As a matter of fact, even the usual monthly and annual reports exacted by such bodies have never been required.

In the District of Columbia, or at least in Washington, practically all power-transmission lines and those serving consumers are buried in conduits. This means expensive construction as compared with the practice in Omaha, and yet the rate base of the Potomac Electric Power Co. for 1928, used for determining charges to consumers, was but $305 per consumer. On this basis the rate base of the Nebraska Power Co. for that year would have been less than $19,500,000 upon which the company's net earnings for 1928 would have indicated a return of 12 per cent, an unconscionable profit to extract from a community in the midst of our distressed agricultural regions.

Mr. President, this is what is going on all over the country. As I stated, 1930, the first year of the depression, was the banner year for power companies of the United States. In 1931, the second year of the depression, the gross income of these power companies was 1½ per cent more than their gross income in 1929, the boom year in this country.

Mr. President, as further evidence of this prosperity, and of the views of the officials of these companies, I hold in my hand the report of the president of the Nebraska Power Co. to the stockholders of that company for 1930. He states:

To the Stockholders of the Nebraska Power Co.:

Submitted herewith is the annual report of your company's operations for 1930.

This year has been a satisfactory one for your company. While the country as a whole has been materially affected by a general slackening of business, the company has had a normal increase in the sale of electrical energy throughout the year. The electric output for the year was 320,412,000 kilowatt-hours, or 20 per cent over 1929. Gross earnings for 1930 were $6,603,262, an increase of $619,392 over 1929, or about 10 per cent, and net earnings from operation amounted to $3,368,510, an increase over the previous year of $404,809, or about 14 per cent.

That, I repeat, is the report of the president of the Nebraska Power Co., to the stockholders of what was achieved in 1930.

I hold in my hand a prospectus respecting stock issued by the Nebraska Power Co., circulated by one of the trust companies of Omaha acting as agent for the sale of these securities. The statement begins:

DEPRESSION-PROOF LOCAL SECURITIES

It is generally agreed that conditions during 1930 and 1931 have materially altered the investment status of many securities. It is common knowledge that a large number of bonds and stocks are no longer well protected by earning power and consequently have declined in price. The fact that during the period in question some companies have succeeded in improving their condition is not so well recognized, but is equally true.

In this connection, the excellent reports of some of the better known local companies are particularly noteworthy.

And then follows the statement that the net earnings for 1931 of the Nebraska Power Co. were $241,000 more than they were in 1930.

Again, Mr. President, I hold in my hand the annual report of the Pacific Lighting Corporation, a public utility operating on the Pacific coast far removed from Washington and Omaha. It begins in this manner:

SAN FRANCISCO, March 12, 1932.

To the STOCKHOLDERS:

The forty-fifth annual report of the Pacific Lighting Corporation and its predecessor company, the Pacific Lighting Co., for the calendar year 1931 follows.

Since the revenues of your companies come principally from the consumption of gas and electricity in all departments of community and industrial life, the 1931 earnings have naturally reflected a part of the present decline in general business.

However, the year 1931 has demonstrated the inherent stability of earnings of public utilities whose business is predominantly in the domestic field, supplying households with inexpensive services which are equally indispensable through good times or bad.

Net earnings available for Pacific Lighting Corporation dividends were $50,659.02 higher than in 1930, notwithstanding the decrease of $884,539.74 in total gross revenue of your companies.

This decrease in gross revenue occurred almost entirely in sales to industries, which have but small effect upon the net because of the low rates.

While there has been a decrease in kilowatts consumed, it is a decrease due to the cessation of manufacturing by establishments which pay very low rates, upon which there is little profit, but the rates paid by domestic consumers, Mr. President, are fixed; they have not varied greatly in the last 10 years, whereas during that period, as I have stated, the cost of generation and distribution has decreased 44 per cent—at least, that has been the case in Omaha.

Mr. President, it is recognized that those should contribute to make up the deficit of the Treasury and to the conduct of the affairs of the Government who are best able to contribute. Here is an industry that has scarcely known there is a depression. It has a tremendous income, amounting to $1,938,000,000 for 1929, and its profits were greater last year than for the preceding year. We are imposing higher taxes on companies whose profits have been greatly affected, but here is a great industry whose profits have not been affected; here is a great industry that can contribute to make up the deficit, that can contribute more than it has been contributing to the conduct of our Government; and if we levy a tax of 3 per cent upon the gross income, we will obtain approximately $50,000,000 to add to the revenues which will be assured by this tax bill.

A similar amendment was proposed in the House, and a somewhat similar amendment by some one besides myself, I presume, was presented to the Finance Committee by the Senate; but the amendment proposed in the House provided for a tax of a quarter of a cent per kilowatt-hour to be collected from consumers. Of course, a tremendous objection to that was made by business interests. There are many manufacturing establishments throughout the country that are buying electricity for a half a cent a kilowatt hour. Such an enterprise would have been confronted with a 50 per cent increase in the cost of power; and, of course, they objected. The amendment I have proposed, however, if it were passed on by the power companies, would mean an increase of only fifteen one-thousandths of a cent per kilowatt-hour.

My amendment does not propose that a constant factor be added to the various rates charged. It is 3 per cent upon whatever the rate may be. It will not be passed on, because it is so small an amount that it will not be practicable to do so. Moreover, if an attempt were made by power companies to pass it on they would have to get the consent of the public-service commissions, and their answer would be, "Very well; if you want to increase your rates it is time to have a valuation of your property," and none would want a revaluation at this time.

Mr. President, this is a practicable method of obtaining additional revenue. Not only is it practicable, but it is a fair and just proposal for obtaining additional revenue. If we obtain additional revenue in this manner, we will be obtaining it from those who are able to pay and not squeezing out additional revenue from those who are suffering from this depression.

I pointed out the other day how little was the profit in the creamery business at the present time. I pointed out that a report from the Dairy Herd Improvement Association of Nebraska—which was organized through the assistance of railroads and other business enterprises in Nebraska in promotion of diversification by farmers and the improvement of dairy herds—a report from that dairy association, based upon 5,086 cows, selected and culled, showed that the average produce for the month of April was a little less than 1 pound of butterfat per day, that the butterfat sold for 15 cents per pound, and that even if we assumed a profit of 1 cent a pound on that butterfat it meant less than 30 cents per month per cow.

I pointed out further that we were putting a 2-cent tax on the checks or drafts that the farmers might draw to secure their pay for their dairy products and their poultry products; and remember that from poultry and dairy products comes one-third of the income of the agricultural industry. I pointed out that we were putting a 2-cent tax on such checks, averaging from $2.15 to $2.40 each; and I begged the Senate to exclude checks of $5 and less. The Senate, however, saw fit to vote down that proposal.

Mr. President, something must be done for agriculture. Agriculture must be rescued. We can do something here for agriculture by taxing sources of revenue that will least affect those who pay; and that is what we should do. I have offered a method of securing $50,000,000. If the Senate saw fit, it could provide for that $50,000,000 and then could relieve the dairymen and the poultrymen from this tax of 2 cents on checks. That would be relief in a small way, at least.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. In what form is the Senator's tax? How does he levy it?

Mr. HOWELL. It is 3 per cent on the gross income of operating power companies, but payable from net earnings only. In other words——

Mr. CONNALLY. If they make it they pay it, and if they do not they do not?

Mr. HOWELL. That is the proposal.

Mr. President, I present this feasible plan. If it is desired to obtain additional income, I do not care how much income this tax bill may produce, we will need this $50,000,000; and there is no industry or other source of income better able to pay than the power industry.

I trust that the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield for that purpose?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the pending amendment is one offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator from Nebraska object to withdrawing his amendment temporarily until I can make a motion? I think the motion I am about to make might expedite the consideration of the bill, and it will not in any way prejudice the amendment of the Senator.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I am willing temporarily to withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska temporarily withdraws his amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, we have reached a point in the consideration of the pending bill when some of us think that we ought to determine just what course we are to take in order to finish its consideration as quickly as possible, and get the bill to conference.

This morning the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, made some three weeks ago, as to the amount required in the way of increases in taxes in order to balance the Budget, was mentioned in some of the speeches. We have practically concluded the consideration of the rates of taxation; and if the remaining odds and ends are accepted by the Senate as recommended by the committee, we will have lost from the original recommendations of the Finance Committee, according to the expert of the joint committee on taxation, Mr. Parker, $47,000,000; and some have said that probably the Treasury has underestimated the receipts.

I voted against the Connally amendment when it was presented. That amendment provided for a 4 per cent normal tax in the first bracket and 8 per cent in the second, going as high as 55 per cent in the surtaxes. If that amendment should now be adopted, after a reconsideration of the vote by which it was defeated, it is estimated by the tax expert, the representative of the Joint Committee on Taxation, that under that amendment there would be collected more than $100,000,000 in excess of what would be collected under the provision heretofore adopted by the Senate. In other words, if, on a reconsideration of the vote, the Connally amendment should be adopted, and if the remaining recommendations of the Finance Committee, which are small in number, should be agreed to, the Government will raise, through this revenue bill, some $50,000,000 more than was estimated by the Treasury Department as necessary to balance the Budget.

Many of us think it is essential that our work should be concluded just as speedily as possible and the consideration of the bill finished. Therefore I am going to move, in order to expedite the passage of this legislation, that the vote by which the Connally amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to reconsider was entered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Chair is advised.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall ask that the motion be taken from the table and a vote had on it.

I appreciate, Mr. President, that there are many Senators here who conscientiously believe that a general sales tax is the proper way of raising the additional revenue needed, that more can be raised through that method than in following the custom we have followed heretofore of raising the excise taxes upon special articles, such as luxuries, amusements, and things of that kind. But we have concluded the consideration of those matters. We have made these excise levies. So far as the Senate is concerned, the consideration of them is practically finished; and even though Senators might believe conscientiously that the sales tax was the best method to be adopted, I think I can say in all truth that it would be impossible to adopt a sales-tax amendment to this bill in the Senate.

The House has already expressed itself on that matter, expressed itself by a majority of 70 on one occasion and 75 on another occasion, and from every fair investigation that can be made in the House, one must conclude that there would be no hope of reversing its action.

I stated the other day, and the statement is confirmed from all I hear to-day, that on the Democratic side in the House, at least, not a single person can be found who has changed his vote from opposition to the sales tax. So there would be no hope in the House, even if there were a majority here, for favorable action upon the sales tax.

So far as the Senate is concerned, so anxious were some of us to speed the pending bill along and conclude its consideration so as to let those who were sponsoring the sales tax know that a majority were against them that we have signed up in a statement here 55 Senators, 35 on this side and 20 on the other side, saying that they will not vote for the general sales tax in connection with this bill.

Is not that evidence sufficient to convince anyone that it would be useless to continue the fight for the sales tax? Some of us are hopeful that this may aid in expediting the passage of the pending bill.

If the motion for a reconsideration of the vote by which the Connally amendment was defeated is agreed to, and the Connally amendment is adopted, we shall then raise through that means forty to fifty million dollars more than the Treasury has estimated is necessary to balance the Budget, and we ought to stay here following that action to-night and get through with these various other propositions and send the bill to conference. In my opinion, there is no reason why it should stay in conference for any considerable time, but I believe it could be gotten back here and acted on and sent to the President within a few days.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Connally amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether 55 Members of the Senate have signed a memorial requesting that no amendment be offered here proposing a manufacturers' excise tax?

Mr. HARRISON. I will read the Senator exactly what was signed:

> In order to expedite the passage of a revenue bill to balance the Budget and to prevent unnecessary prolongation of debate thereon, the undersigned now declare that they will at this time vote against any and every form of general sales tax on the pending bill.

That is signed by 20 Senators on the other side and 35 on this.

We are not trying to forestall the Senator from offering any amendment—if the Senator feels like offering the amendment, well and good. We only hope we can consider it speedily and take a vote upon it.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one observation?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield for an observation.

Mr. MOSES. Once before in the history of the Senate within my time a round robin has been signed. The manager of the round robin did not hesitate to put it into the RECORD with the signatures, and I ask the Senator from Mississippi if he will not do that with the document to which he has just referred?

Mr. HARRISON. So far as the Democratic side is concerned, I ask unanimous consent to insert the statement in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> In order to expedite the passage of a revenue bill to balance the Budget and to prevent unnecessary prolongation of debate thereon, the undersigned now declare that they will at this time vote against any and every form of a general sales tax on the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The list is as follows:

In order to expedite the passage of a revenue bill to balance the Budget and to prevent unnecessary prolongation of debate thereon, the undersigned now declare that they will at this time vote against any and every form of general sales tax on the pending bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this is the first time since I have been a Member of the Senate when I have observed indirect methods being resorted to for the purpose of preventing open, free debate and discussion of an important public question. It seems to me the action that has been taken by Members of this body can mean nothing less than an attempt to close the door against the presentation and discussion of an important public question.

If this precedent shall be followed, we will behold the spectacle of round robins being circulated through this Chamber on every occasion when any Senator proposes to offer a bill or an amendment to an important bill. It is legislating in secret. It is offensive to every theory of representative government that the Senate has heretofore cherished.

The action seems to me to be all the more deserving of condemnation when we appreciate that we are dealing with a question of vital importance to this country, and one which has tremendous support throughout the land.

I can well understand Members of this body differing and opposing the imposition of a manufacturers' excise tax, but I can not understand any Member of this body, when he realizes that this question is considered of such vital importance by the business interests of this country, regardless of party, as it is, signing Members of this body to take a position before there has been debate, before there has been discussion, even before the proposal has been formally offered in this Chamber.

This is not even cloture. It is an attempt to prevent or block the introduction of petitions to be heard. It is slamming the door in the face of petitioners who ask only for a right to be heard through their elected officials, for an open, frank debate, and that Members of this body keep their minds open until the time comes for calling the roll. It is like asking a jury to sign a round robin before a case is heard, indicating their opposition to any finding which might be justified upon hearing the evidence, and after hearing all the arguments in the case.

Mr. President, I construe the action taken to be nothing more nor less than an attempt to embarrass and restrict open and free discussion of this important question. Furthermore, I believe it will have a very detrimental effect upon the country. Rightly or wrongly, millions of citizens deeply concerned about the economic conditions in this country believe in this proposal. It would be bad enough, from their standpoint, to meet with defeat after discussion; but before even discussion begins, when 55 Senators declare that no matter what the arguments may be, no matter how powerful the reasons for a given position may appear, they propose to close their ears and to close their eyes and refuse to go forward under any conditions with what millions of men and women believe to be the one necessary and essential and vital thing to restore hope and confidence in the economic life of the Nation. I can not find words strong enough to denounce the procedure.

DES MOINES, IOWA, May 30, 1932.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.,
Senate Office Building:

My answer, yes. Will not support sales tax.

SMITH W. BROOKHART.

The country will strongly condemn it. It is, to say it very mildly, an attempt to intimidate action and an attempt to restrict open and free discussion. It is un-American, it is undemocratic, at this stage in the proceeding, to have a document signed and presented here indicating a course of action which the Senate proposes to take before it has even had the question formally presented or had any discussion on the merits or demerits of the question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as I now understand it, the matter under consideration is the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to reconsider the vote by which his amendment was rejected, which, if carried, will bring about another vote to determine whether or not the income-tax schedule shall be raised as provided in the so-called Connally amendment.

I voted for that before, and it was defeated, as I recollect, by a vote of 46 to 31. I voted for a more extreme income-tax rate schedule presented by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. That was defeated by a very much larger vote. I think the effort of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] through the motion to reconsider will be entirely futile. It is perfectly apparent now that an effort to raise further taxes by a combination of the so-called manufacturers' tax with the House exemptions, combined with the raise in the taxes on incomes, is equally foreclosed. I do not wish to place the blame on particular groups or factions for this condition, and yet I am satisfied there has been a mistake in action on both sides in the matter.

On Thursday, May 26, I made some remarks on this subject. I wish to read a few of them for the RECORD at the present time, as very few Senators heard what the proposed compromise was which I offered, and the press either did not mention it at all or misrepresented it. On that occasion I said:

If I were only satisfied with balancing the Budget as the Budget seems to be anticipated by the administration, it would not be a matter that would be very material to me; but as one of those who feel that it is essential in some way to raise more money to meet destitution in this country and to carry on the productive works of the Federal Government, I feel that this whole process of raising money is going to be unsatisfactory.

I think so now. I have not changed my mind about it at all.

I have constantly opposed a manufacturers' tax or a sales tax because I believe that it is in the nature of a per capita tax. I think the fairest tax we ever inaugurated in this country was the income tax. It is based on a sound principle, in my opinion. We are told, however, that there is a limit to the return from an income tax as the rate is raised. That may be true to a certain extent; but I do not believe it is absolutely true in any sense of the word, because I believe that the experience of the income-tax collections in England absolutely refutes it.

* * * * * * *

I realize that this legislation is only emergency legislation that will exist, I believe, for a period of two years—at least, it should be limited to that. We should treat it exactly as war emergency legislation, in my judgment. I believe that the legislators in this body and in the other House will have to reach a compromise. Human nature has manifested itself here in a way that everyone understands. Everyone wants to raise revenue to balance the Budget, and yet the constituents of every Senator here are opposed to a tax on those things that they produce. That attitude is reflected in the votes of Senators, and it is natural that it should reflect itself in their votes.

I wish to state personally—

Here is the compromise I suggested:

I wish to state personally that I have arrived at the point where I am prepared and willing to vote for a manufacturers' sales tax along the lines suggested by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, with the exceptions provided in the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, provided that those in this body who have opposed an increase in the income taxes over and above those reported in this bill by the Finance Committee are also willing to make concessions and vote for a substantial increase in the income taxes over and above those reported in the bill coming from the Finance Committee.

That was the compromise I suggested for consideration. Further on in that address I said:

What I want to know now is whether it is impossible for those who feel that they represent the poor people of this country, on account of the localities, we will say, in which they live, where poor people do exist, to meet with those who represent constituencies where the great wealth of the country is in increasing the burdens of both classes so as to avoid the constant skipping around the edge of whether or not we are going to balance the Budget; and, even if we balance the Budget, whether we will have anything left after we balance it with which to meet the real obligations of this Government toward its destitute people and its unemployed. That is what I want to know.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think we have already gone more than half way in that direction. We have more than doubled the income taxes which will be paid by all classes of income-tax payers from the smallest to the biggest. We know that if we raise those income-tax rates further on the big incomes the yield will be perfectly negligible. We can tax the big incomes up to 80 per cent if we wish, and we would not add more than four or five million dollars to the revenue of the United States, because those incomes have well-nigh disappeared.

Further on I stated:

I am endeavoring to urge the Senate to do something bold, something unselfish, not only for the purpose of taking away the capital tax of 10 per cent on the wage earners of the country, not alone for the purpose of balancing a Budget that means bare existence, but for the purpose of balancing a Budget that does away with the necessity of this cut of 10 per cent in the wages of those people, and, in addition, that which will make available to the Treasury of the United States enough money to meet its necessary duty toward the destitute of the country where the local authorities, the municipalities and the States, have found that they have exhausted all their resources.

I want a sufficient fund for the purpose of enabling the Government to go on with its normal and natural development in the country. It can not be done under the terms of this bill as it is now before us, and we know it is impossible. Therefore I am willing to vote for the per capita tax if Senators on the other side of the Chamber have enough bold and unselfish courage to face the necessity of increasing the income tax upon the income-tax payers of the country. If they are unwilling to meet that compromise, then, of course, I will financially die with the poor constituents of my State like those Senators will probably die with the rich constituents of their States.

How was that suggested compromise met? The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] boldly stated that he was in accord with the theory. Some Senators on this side of the Chamber voluntarily stated to me that they were in accord with the theory. Other Senators on the other side of the Chamber later in the day said they had come to the conclusion that it would be essential.

But what did the press of the country say? Was there anything indefinite about the suggested compromise? Was there anything that could be misunderstood by the able and experienced representatives of the press, many of whom have sat here as long as I have? Not at all; not in the slightest. And yet I challenge anyone to take a metropolitan paper reporting that day's proceedings, or any special article written by an able and conscientious writer, and find a single, solitary reference to the compromise. One article did me the honor to state that I made an address supporting a compromise for substituting the manufacturers' sales tax for the excise tax in the bill. Was there any foundation for that statement? It would have been fairer to have said nothing at all about what I said. Is there any Senator who represents a constituency who are burdened by the income tax who since that time has ever said a public word in favor of such a compromise?

The metropolitan press who favor the manufacturers' sales tax have favored it editorially for weeks. They have obtained statements from financiers and industrialists in support of it. Did they editorially mention the advisability of such a compromise? Did they urge any of the big income-tax payers to meet the proposition and favor an increased tax upon themselves while favoring an increased tax upon all the rest of the people of the country? Not a word of it. Not an interview from any source advocating it. Why? Let us be frank about it.

Many of us have known members of the press gallery for 20 years. They know every current in this body. They know every faction here. They know every school of thought. They know exactly what a Senator means when he speaks. They understood the proposal I threw out for consideration. It would seem peculiar to the stranger to press reports that the only report of the compromise suggested on that day was a substitution of the manufacturers' sales tax for the excise tax in this bill. But it is not peculiar; it is not strange. It is the natural thing.

If the gentlemen in the press galleries owned the papers, we would have newspapers; but to-day the metropolitan press of the country is personally owned and personally used for personal propaganda, and everyone knows it, and I challenge anyone of them to deny it. There is but one newspaper published around this section, so far as I know, which is not in that category, and that is the United States Daily. That journal actually publishes the debates in this body on both sides of every question.

Think of the injustice of attributing such an attitude to me, who has for years charged that the sales tax was a burden and was a per capita tax. I repeated that statement the other day, and gave my reason because of which alone I would stand for a burden of that kind, namely, in order that we might obtain increased revenue for this country, my opinion being that that was the only way we could obtain the necessary amount. Yet the statement I have indicated was made about my position.

Undoubtedly the manufacturers' sales tax would be a burden on the poor people of this country; but every tax eventually reaches the consumer, and the excise taxes which we have in this bill to-day will reach them exactly the same as would a manufacturers' sales tax. There can be no question about that.

I was willing to vote for the excise taxes, but I do not believe that we can raise sufficient money from them to do what we want to do, nor do I believe that we can possibly raise sufficient money without making those who have the money pay higher taxes on their incomes; and I do not believe we can do it without a compromise. However, that is now dead and gone; that is over.

I only rose for the purpose of placing myself right, at least with the United States Senate, because one can never place himself right with the country when the press sees fit to misrepresent his attitude for political purposes. That, however, is immaterial. I only want the Senate to know, before I conclude, what the situation is, so far as I am concerned.

As I stated the other day—and I repeat the statement now—I am more interested in the Government having sufficient money with which to pay the interest on its obligations and to insure the amortization of its debt, so that it may take some action to reduce unemployment in this country and relieve destitution, than I am in the question of increasing taxes 10 per cent, no matter on whom the burden may fall. Yet we have repeatedly by our action reached the point where the administration will be unable, in its opinion and under its philosophy, to aid those suffering because of lack of employment in this country.

Mr. Mills a few days ago stated that this bill, if enacted as reported, would balance the Budget if an economy program were adopted by Congress, which would reduce the Budget $300,000,000. What does that mean? That means we have got to start in on a policy of cutting the wages of Government employees. Although such a program will result in reducing expenditures only about $12,000,000, yet the policy has got to be established or the Budget will not be balanced. It means that the present contention that we can not afford at this time to enter upon the construction of any Government work will be justified by the argument that Congress has not provided sufficient money for the Treasury with which to pay interest on Government obligations or to provide the necessary sinking fund and amortization requirements for obligations which might be issued, whether they be called bonds or debentures or promissory notes or I O U's.

I heard the subterfuge mentioned the other day that it would not cost the Government anything because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could issue its debentures and the Treasury could buy them. Where does the Treasury get the money with which to buy debentures? Does not the Treasury have to borrow the money to buy the debentures from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? Does it not have to issue interest-bearing obligations that must be redeemed?

It is a circuitous route and a circuitous reason. It means nothing; it is a subterfuge. Yet everyone knows that there is a bill pending before the Banking and Currency Committee, which was drafted by 5 Senators and approved by 20 or 30 others, that not only provides for $1,500,000,000 to aid in self-liquidating projects that carry a rental or a toll or royalty which will insure the return of the fund—and that is all the bankers of this country want, as I understand—but also provides $500,000,000 for Government work of the character and the kind that is of economic benefit to the United States; that is, the Government will make more by the investment of the money than it will by continuing to rent properties in various places. However, the President is opposed to that. We proposed that bonds should be issued as and when necessary as the work progressed, but he said "No; we can not issue any more bonds," though he himself is willing to provide the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with $1,500,000,000 for corporations which are self-supporting. How can that be done and $500,000,000 not be provided which may be made available through debentures of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation without burden on the Government? The Treasury Department simply buys, so they say, the debentures and nobody is out of pocket. I trust that I do not have to argue that absurdity any longer.

What I am getting at is this: This bill is going to pass soon. I would not engage in the absurd process of attempting further to carry out the suggested compromise that I threw out; it is useless to do so. Fifty-five Senators have agreed not to vote for any form of sales tax under any form of amendment, no matter whether it were coupled with the Couzens amendment as to income taxes or not. So that ends that; we are through; we will pass this bill, and I see no use in any longer debating it one way or the other. Let us pass it!

According to Mr. Mills, the revenue it will bring in will be $300,000,000 less than the amount necessary to balance the kind of existing, nonconstructive, nonrelief Budget he has in mind. Pass it! We ought to pass it. It is Mr. Mills's bill. Why should we take the responsibility when this powerful administration and its great economist and financier say the bill is fine? I think possibly all of us have been absurd in wasting time thinking. We will pass Mr. Mills's bill, and we ought to pass it to-night before we quit. It will not come within $300,000,000 of balancing the Budget, and yet he has sent no supplemental estimate and no further advice except through the newspapers. He trusts for carrying out his policy on economies in Government expenditures, which means the slashing of Government wages, not because of the amount of money involved, because that will only mean a saving of $12,000,000, but in order to establish a policy; and that must be done because, under the statement of the President, it will be impossible to go on with Government work. If we are going to do without that, then let us pass the bill.

It would have been better if at the start the House and the Senate both had done just what they are doing now and had then simply said to the Chief Executive, "Mr. President, this deficit has arisen under your administration; you have more knowledge of it than Congress has; you have all the instrumentalities to enable you to know how to raise the money; tell us how much you want and how to raise it, and we will vote it." It would have been much better. We would have obviated these months of attempted thought. But now it is a foregone conclusion.

I am not worried about balancing the Budget. I am worried as to the excuses that will arise and will exist and will be offered by the administration if we put no more money in the Treasury than this bill will put there. I do not think it takes any vivid imagination to realize that the President will say, "We have not the money with which to pay the interest or establish a sinking fund for any new Government obligations, and, therefore, we will stop; we will exist as we are; we will continue as we are; all the programs to relieve unemployment will be impossible."

As we know, there are two schools of thought here. One school of thought sincerely believe that all that is necessary to do is to establish confidence in the minds of the bankers of this country and prosperity will return at once. That belief is sincerely entertained. There is another school of thought, constituted of those who believe that the downward trend that has been going on for two years is now a race downhill toward the precipice, and will soon reach that precipice unless something is done to increase the purchasing power of this country. Every time unemployment is added to, every time commodity prices fall, the number of people in this country who can not buy is increased; when they can not buy the local storekeeper ceases to order from the wholesaler, the wholesaler from the manufacturer, the manufacturer discharges employees, and every time he discharges an employee he adds to the number of those who can not purchase. So the vicious circle revolves and grows until it is crushing the richest as well as the poor people in this country and will continue to do so.

That school of thought under the administration away back in 1929 commenced to handle this thing through the "great minds of the country." It is wonderful what the "great minds" of this country have done so far. It is too bad they could not have been in Congress, they think. Away back in 1929 the National Committee on Law Enforcement and Observance, under Wickersham, was created. Does anybody know just exactly what that commission accomplished? Then we had the Federal Farm Board, under James C. Stone. Has that organization stopped the depression in the farming sections of the country? Then we had the Committee on the Conservation and Administration of the Public Domain. Has anything happened with regard to that? And here is the prize commission of all; here is a commission that should have satisfied everyone who has a hatred for the Congress of the United States; here is something that is often advised now—National Business Survey Conference, Julius Barnes, chairman. Mr. Julius Barnes was very closely associated with the President, as I understand, in a business way years ago. He was president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and he gathered together all the best financial and business minds of the United States in a business-survey conference for the purpose of settling this whole trouble; and what happened? Mr. Barnes resigned and the commission scattered.

Here is another one: Conference on Home Building and Ownership. They could not trust Congress for anything like that. That required independent men of genius and of brains, great business men, great bankers, economists. They gather them all together, and they go down to the White House, and they sit around and talk wisely, and they come out, and the whole country is enthusiastic. Stocks go up half of 1 per cent; they go up half a point probably, if there is any such thing, because few of them went up a point. Well, how about the house building? The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] makes a speech to find out why the rents are going up, and no houses are built.

Here is another good one. Now, mind you, this has all been done: The Advisory Committee on Unemployment Statistics—Mr. John P. Frazier. What unemployment statistics did they get? What advice did they give us as to how to relieve unemployment? In what way did they aid the Congress of the United States, and what suggestion did they make that we could put into legislation? None; and every time a Senator or Congressman has dared to make a suggestion with regard to unemployment, they said, "This is a matter for business men, not for Congress. You can not accomplish this by legislation. It has to be accomplished through business methods."

Here is another one—the Emergency Committee for Unemployment; Col. Arthur Woods, director; Secretary Lamont, chairman.

There was a committee headed by one of the great business men of this country. He was going to solve the unemployment problem; was he not? We did not interfere with him here in Congress. We let him go. We were ready to take any recommendations he made. What did he accomplish? What recommendations did he make to Congress? Nothing—absolutely nothing.

Here is another one. This became a law: The Federal Employment Stabilization Commission, headed by D. H. Sawyer. This was Senator Wagner's bill. That committee has done good work. It has done splendid work. Mr. Sawyer has been before the subcommittee on this side of the Chamber that prepared a bill and brought it in here. It was on his advice and on his information that we provided $500,000,000 for construction work. I want to say that there is not a project mentioned by Mr. Sawyer in that whole thing that will not be an economic project for the United States Government, and no one has denied it. Mr. Sawyer's recommendation is opposed by the President, and will continue to be opposed, principally on the ground that our Government can not raise sufficient money. Poor Government!

All right. We have another one here—the President's Organization on Unemployment Relief. Walter S. Gifford is the head of it, one of the biggest business men in this country, familiar with employment. What did Mr. Gifford do? Did he tend to reduce unemployment? Did he suggest anything practical that Congress could do? No. He ran away from the job; that is what he did. Yet whenever anyone in Congress suggests any legislation looking toward it he is met with the answer, "You can not accomplish these things through legislation."

We have had another meeting lately of the bankers' committee. They have called all the bankers together now. Why? They called the bankers together to ask them to be good, to be generous. That is what they called them together for—to chide them; to say, "Why do you not circulate currency among the people? Why do you not help do something? Congress has passed the Glass-Steagall bank bill, which will allow you, if you want to, to circulate three or four billion dollars in currency throughout the country; and, as a matter of fact, you have not circulated anything. Do not do that. You are getting us in bad." But the bankers of the country say, "We hold trust funds. We can not lend money to industry that is not profitable." They say, "No industry that can not make money on the money that we lend it will borrow money, and we do not like to lend it to any other kind." The bankers are right. Industry is right. Would you expect a business institution that is using only 20 per cent of its capacity, and can not earn money on the investment, to borrow more money? What for? That would be an utterly futile thing to do.

We come back to the fundamental principle that people can not sell unless other people have money to buy. There is not a thing that has been suggested that will increase more than a very little the purchasing power of the people of this country.

It is admitted that there are from eight to ten million idle men, and that means three times that number when we count their dependents—30,000,000 nonbuyers out of 125,000,000 people. Everyone knows that most of the farmers of this country can not sell their product for what it costs them to produce it; and while they are more fortunate than those of the cities, because they can eat their own produce and not starve to death, they can not buy.

The fact is called to my attention that we had an antihoarding committee. What an absurd thing—to advise a man who has no confidence in a bank to leave his money there through patriotism! It was not done. The money that has gone out of the Federal reserve banks into the purchasing of bonds, and so forth, is not in the banks to-day. Two-thirds of it has disappeared from the banks and has gone into safe-deposit boxes. It was taken out for that very purpose. Yet we hear the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to-day state that the gold is leaving this country just as fast as the insurance can be paid on it. It is true. We read in the papers that the poor Italian is sending his gold notes over here so as to have them put in the form of gold to take back to Italy. It is true. But tell me, who has caused the scare in this country?

You have not heard the farmers of this country crying that Government bonds were no good. You have not heard them say anything about the disappearance of gold. You have not heard them say anything about hoarding. You have not even heard the patient eight or ten million unemployed people of the country saying it.

I want to say to you, and I charge it, that the timidity and the selfishness of large banks and those of the greatest wealth in this country have communicated their fear not only to all the people of this country, which has caused withdrawals from banks and hoarding, but they have extended that fear to foreign countries.

Whenever anyone says—any bond buyer, any man with capital—that there is any chance whatever of the bonds of this country ever being repudiated, he is not only a coward but he is unintelligent. The taxing power of this country extends to everything in the country, not only to the income but to capital, to the land, to everything. Do you tell me that this country, with its hundred of billion dollars' worth of property, is not good for four or five or six or ten or twenty billions of dollars in bonds? It is perfectly absurd. If the bonds of this country are not good, it means that this country is not good; and if this country is not good, I ask you, Where in the name of Heaven can you find any country that is worth a continental?

If the great bankers of this country and the bond buyers and capital of this country will just come out and say the word, "We will buy every bond that this Government issues," we will not have the poor Italians and the poor Germans, and everybody else with a few American gold notes or securities exchanging their holdings for gold.

I guarantee to you that the everyday man and woman that we meet throughout the length and breadth of this country—in the little stores, on the farms, in the brickyards, labor, and everyone else—have more confidence in this Government than the men who have made fortunes out of it, who should have the most confidence in it. Instead of calling bankers together and begging them to do something that they do not want to do and do not intend to do, let us act on our own judgment with fearlessness, and we can put men and women to work, increase commodity prices, and restore confidence in our Government and prosperity in our country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to submit a brief observation touching the situation in which the Senate now finds itself respecting the sales tax, the increased income tax, and the swift completion of this Budget-balancing bill.

I was not one of those who signed the so-called round robin against the general sales tax; but I am unable to agree with the able and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that those who did sign the round robin are guilty of any disservice either to the Senate situation or to the country. It seems to me that in a situation where time is so utterly the essence of our desperate problem, any clear demonstration of the unalterable purpose and will of a clear majority of the Senate respecting a major proposition is an exceedingly important thing to have at the bar of the Senate. It obviously makes for the speed of decision which the country wants and which our fiscal situation requires.

Therefore, it seems to me—and I repeat that I was not a signer of the round robin—that since there are 55 Senators who take this conclusive and final attitude against any substitution of any general sales tax for the other excise items in this bill, it was distinctly an act of useful public service to make that plain at the present hour. Thus the track is expeditiously cleared for final action.

Every man in the Senate knows that I am utterly opposed to the special discriminatory excise taxes in this bill. They know that I have supported every possible alternative for those taxes. I have supported the 1918 income taxes and the 1922 income taxes as alternatives. I joined with the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] in proposing a composition between higher income taxes and manufacturers' production taxes by way of a substitution. I have favored the latter tax alone if that would do the job. But the important thing above everything else is expedition in the conclusion of these labors. The utterly important thing is that we shall not waste time upon futilities. Therefore, I submit again that when the demonstration is laid upon the bar of the Senate that any further consideration of a general sales tax at the present time is a futility, it is a service to the situation and the country to have that demonstration made. In its presence I bow to the inevitable.

In the face of this demonstration, Mr. President, I heartily concur in the hope expressed by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that we may proceed in order to complete the pending bill to-night without any further needless consideration of futile tax alternatives. The doom of a general sales tax is written in advance. There is nothing to be gained by discussing it. At least let us give the country the benefit that will come from the earliest possible conclusion of the issue.

I can think of nothing that would be a finer culmination of this national holiday, which we have dedicated to the public work, than to crown it with the conclusion of this bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the nature of the taxes we shall impose, the character of the taxes we shall select, is of entirely subordinate importance to the greater question, whether this country shall show a determination to balance its income with its expenses.

As a sincere believer in the justice of a uniform manufacturers' excise tax, I have thought that that was preferable to the system of irregular, spasmodic special excise taxes on particular industries. But that disagreement would be relatively unimportant if the bill now before the Senate actually balanced our Budget and showed the country that American finances were sound. The trouble is that the bill would not do that. We know it, the Treasury knows it, the public knows it, the people in foreign countries know it. They know, as do we, that the estimates upon which we rely when we say that this bill would balance the Budget have become untrue by the falling off in business since they were made last February.

Even if the Connally amendment, embodying the 1922 income-tax rates, be adopted, the pending bill as it stands will fall short a couple of hundred million dollars of meeting our necessities, of matching our income with our expenses in the next fiscal year; and I say that is true even if our Economy Committee is able to accomplish its utmost ambition and save for us somewhere in the neighborhood of $300,000,000 on our spending.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the Senator is correct, would we not have to impose a sales tax of more than 1¾ per cent?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. I fail to understand the Senator's logic. If these estimates prove groundless to the extent of $200,000,000 of loss, by the same token will not the amount suggested for a general manufacturers' tax of 1¾ per cent likewise prove defective?

Mr. REED. The estimate of the yield from a 1¾ per cent manufacturers' sales tax, made up this very month of May, indicates that its yield will be about $335,000,000.

Mr. President, I say again, and I hope I may be understood, that after effecting economies amounting to some $300,000,000, after passing this bill with all the additional taxes it imposes, after ignoring the sinking fund upon our national debt—and complying with the sinking-fund requirement by fresh borrowing, retiring one bond by issuing another—after doing all those things, we still are going to be short of income in the next fiscal year, according to the best information I can secure, by about $200,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. The question that presents itself is whether the 55 signatures on this round robin, which begins with the declaration that it is the desire of those Senators who sign it to balance the Budget, will prevent a different decision by the signers when they come to know the full facts.

I am so confident, Mr. President, of the patriotism of the Senators who have signed that round robin that I know that their patriotism will rise higher than the superficial assurance they have given in this round robin.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator speaks of patriotism. What about the patriotism of the Treasury Department? Has it been withholding from the Senate the facts as to these estimates? Was it not stated last night by the Secretary of the Treasury that the items now in this bill would balance the Budget, with the exception of $56,000,000?

Mr. REED. There was no statement to that effect in my hearing.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator knows that the Secretary of the Treasury has been before our committee repeatedly; and if he had known all along that his estimates were erroneous and false, why have not the Secretary of the Treasury and the administration told the Congress of those facts, and why is it that the Senator from Pennsylvania, seemingly in possession of all this knowledge, withholds it until the last moment in an effort to seek to drive through the Senate the sales tax?

Mr. REED. Those estimates when made were not erroneous or false. Those estimates were probably amply warranted on the assumption that Congress would act with reasonable speed to get through a tax bill. Congress has not done that for reasons upon which I need not dilate. Delay has resulted, and during that delay the business of this Nation has so far gone off that the same taxes will not yield the money they were estimated to yield when they were discussed last winter.

That is perfectly natural. Within the last three weeks the picture has changed very much for the worse. Within the last 12 hours the foreign-exchange markets abroad, which have been opened on this day, have crumpled against us. There is no question about it in anyone's mind.

We are going to face the facts when we consider this bill the remainder of the time it is under consideration. We are going to face the facts and realize that as Americans it is our duty to balance the Budget and show the world that America is sound. We know it is sound, but the world has begun to distrust it.

As I said this morning, gold is being drained out of the United States as fast as the steamers can take it. The amount that can be carried upon any one steamer is limited by the amount of insurance the underwriters will give on a single shipment in one vessel, and, thank heaven, the number of vessels going is comparatively limited. We lost about $100,000,000 in the six business days of last week. We lost half that much the week before. Heaven only knows what we will lose this week. But the limit is the capacity of the steamers themselves and the amount of insurance that can be obtained upon them.

We can stand that drain for a while, but unless we balance our Budget and do it now, in this session, we will be exposed to a drain which can mean nothing else than a gold embargo, which will mean going off the gold standard.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. What the Senator has said about the estimates being right a few days ago and not right now, that we do not have any now that are correct, and that this change is going on continually, will make it impossible—if the Senator's theory is right, as I get it—for us ever to balance the Budget. What assurance have we, if we balance it to suit the Senator to-night, that it will not be off to-morrow?

Mr. REED. Only the assurance that common sense gives us, that if we once remove the cloud that is hanging over the fiscal affairs of the American Government, if we once show people that there at least is something that is stable that men can have confidence in, we will have laid the groundwork for a decent resumption of business, and until we do that it is an utter impossibility for business to resume. Until the fiscal affairs at Washington are sound, the fiscal affairs of no one in this country will be sound. Until the United States Government is firmly on a gold basis, until the world knows that it is paying as it goes, no one's fiscal affairs can be considered as on a safe basis.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I want to ask the Senator, If we had balanced the Budget three weeks ago, or at any other time in the recent past, according to the figures of the Treasury Department, if we had balanced it on the very day when the Treasury Department gave its estimates, I take it the decline would not have taken place and that business would be operating now as usual?

Mr. REED. It is an absolute certainty that the decline in the exchanges would not have taken place. There is a very strong probability that the demoralization we saw last week in the bond market would not have taken place.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it follows, it seems to me, that if the members of the Finance Committee had stayed out of the combination that was formed, if they had not gone into a deal to put into the bill the four tariff items, covering coal, lumber, oil, and copper, we could have balanced the Budget then and passed the bill long ago, if that combination had never been made, and we would have escaped all this trouble, according to the Senator.

Mr. REED. We might have saved three or four days in the consideration of the bill, and every day we had saved would have been that much to the good.

Mr. NORRIS. We would have saved at least a week.

Mr. REED. Perhaps.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no doubt in anybody's mind that the bill could have been passed long before this if that had not been done.

Mr. REED. That is possible.

Mr. NORRIS. And when we find that the leaders of the Finance Committee voted to put these tariff items in, it seems to me we ought to put the responsibility for the delay right where it belongs.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think that much more important than recrimination is a study of what we are going to do now, and that brings me to the closing point I wish to make.

I have said that I think the patriotism of the signers of the round robin transcends all else; that if they found it to be necessary, on further study of the facts, to retract the declaration in the round robin I believe they would do it.

In conclusion, when we come to see what this bill does and find out how far short of the necessities it comes and then begin to explore the field of possible additional taxes to fill the gap, I believe we will find it an impossibility to fill the gap without resorting to the general manufacturers' excise tax.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What amount of revenue would be stricken from the bill by the proposed general sales tax amendment?

Mr. REED. I have not studied the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts since it was printed, but I have a notion that it would result in striking out more than we could afford to strike out. Obviously, if we have the task of balancing the Budget, we will strike out just as much as we can afford to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I regard the Senator as something of an expert on this subject, and he is speaking as if he were, if he will pardon me for the statement.

Mr. REED. I think time has impeached them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Secretary himself has not impeached them. The Senate has no information that he regards the figures as inapplicable now. I repeat the question, What amount of revenue does the proposed general sales-tax amendment strike from the bill, or approximately what amount?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is $292,000,000.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Here is a proposal to strike out $292,000,000 and add $325,000,000 or $335,000,000. That is a poor way to overcome what the Senator from Pennsylvania says is a deficit as of to-day of $200,000,000.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, but very obviously it will not be possible to vote to strike from the bill $292,000,000. That was the hope of the Senator from Massachusetts when he prepared his amendment. Evidently it was. But I am perfectly confident that he can not realize that ambition, that we will not strike so much from the bill, because we shall have to retain a very considerable part of it. If in the final analysis we can strike from the bill $135,000,000 of these special taxes, I shall be satisfied under the circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What special taxes that have been agreed to by the Senate does the Senator now propose to strike from the bill?

Mr. REED. I would leave that to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator would have to leave it to the Senate?

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am trying to get the thought that is in the mind of the Senator. He is insisting that the adoption of the general sales-tax amendment is essential to the balancing of the Budget. He realizes, as I think we all realize, that we are committed to that balancing policy and that the Senate has proceeded implicitly upon the figures furnished by the Treasury Department.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And that the proposal which is now before the Senate will result in an excess of some $50,000,000 above the amount which the Secretary in his last statement said would be required to accomplish the balancing of the Budget. Now, the Senator proposes not to agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. He says that will not do because the problem has progressed since that amendment was offered and he thinks that if action were immediately taken $135,000,000 instead of $292,000,000 can be stricken from the bill and the Budget balanced if the general sales-tax proposal be adopted in a modified form.

Mr. REED. The answer to that is that we will strike from the bill the special taxes just as far as we can afford to do it and leave the Budget balanced. If I am not ready to reply at once as to which specific taxes I would prefer to exclude, I would remind the Senator that we have not yet had an opportunity to consider the Walsh amendment. By the time we have considered it we shall doubtless have that specific information which will enable us to specify just what should be stricken out.

Furthermore, if I am vague in the exact amount of shortage which will result from the passage of the bill now before us, I would remind the Senator that part of that vagueness is due to the fact that by objection this morning on the part of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] we were not permitted to pass a resolution calling upon Mr. Mills for his up-to-date estimate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We had the information through the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] in an unofficial way. I myself had no objection to the consideration of the resolution to which the Senator has referred, and I made no objection.

But if I may have just a moment of the Senator's time to express the thought that is in my mind——

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Time is of the essence of this matter. Prompt action is essential. The Finance Committee reported a bill to the Senate two weeks ago which was commonly accepted as calculated to balance the Budget. The proposal of a general sales tax, having been rejected in the House, was not brought forward by the Finance Committee. It was brought forward in the minority report by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. The Senate relied on the report of the committee. It relied on the refusal of the Finance Committee to make a recommendation for a general sales tax.

Now it is proposed to undo all that has been done during the two weeks in which the Senate has been considering the bill. It is proposed to upset every arrangement the Finance Committee recommended and resort to a new form of taxation which, if properly considered, will require a length of time during which the conditions complained of will progress, and by the time the amendment is made applicable it will be necessary to resort to new forms of taxation.

If the Senator will permit me further——

Mr. REED. I believe I have the floor, and I would like to answer the Senator as he goes along.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I know the Senator has the floor.

Mr. REED. Time is important. It is vitally important. But time is not so important as the honest balancing of the Budget. Nothing could be worse for the United States than for us, under the plea of hurry, to adjourn with our job half done. We must get the Budget balanced. If it takes three or four days more to do it, that will hurt the country infinitely less than to adjourn with insufficient revenue provided for.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Can we agree now on a time to vote on the sales tax amendment and all other amendments to the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Without further debate?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; without further debate.

Mr. REED. Of course not, Mr. President. We have got to get the figures from the Treasury to know what our task is. We have got to find out what the shortage is. If I am correct in my estimate, it is about $200,000,000; but no one can act on my estimate. We have got to get the advice of the Secretary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the difficulty of the matter. The condition is constantly changing, and the Senator is not even willing to act on his own estimate. He wants an estimate to-morrow that will become obsolete before an agreement can be had to vote on the bill.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has been kind to me in permitting me to interrupt him and I wish to repeat, in conclusion of my interruption, that I think we ought to vote. It is all right to say that these great questions are of interest to the country and that they ought to be debated at length. But if a Senator knows how he is going to vote what is the use of prolonging the debate? What is the use of deferring the vote?

Mr. REED. No Senator knows how he is going to vote until he knows the facts. I know the Senator from Arkansas too well to think that he would close his mind to vital facts which affect the situation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Bring the facts forward.

Mr. REED. That is what I have been trying to do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What are we to do? We have asked for official information.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. We do not do that. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] this morning tried to ask for official information, and the consideration of his resolution was blocked.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Secretary was called before the Committee on Finance and asked the specific question just a few days ago, and his answers were that if the bill which the committee had in contemplation were reported with certain reductions on account of economies that were in prospect, he would feel at liberty to state to the country that it had accomplished the balancing of the Budget.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I hesitate to take any of the time of the Senate on account of the importance of the situation and the necessity for getting action on the bill. But I want to remind the Senator that for six months we have been working on this bill, and during that time the deficit has increased $600,000,000.

Mr. REED. And it will increase $600,000,000 more if we take six months more to consider it further.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. While we had the bill under consideration in committee the sales tax was the subject of controversy and occasioned considerable delay. I am not blaming either side, but the delay occurred. Before reporting the bill out, the chairman of the committee asked the Secretary of the Treasury to come before the committee and tell us whether or not he approved of our action. On that occasion, as the Senator will remember, Mr. Mills came before the committee and as earnestly and as eloquently as I ever heard the question presented stressed the importance of speed and of the necessity of getting the bill out.

I have voted since that time for many rates to which I was opposed, but in the interest of getting the bill passed. But that day, as the Senator will no doubt recall, I called attention to the fact that the sales tax was the cause of the delay, but that in order to get the bill reported out and passed so that the Budget might be balanced I was perfectly willing to accept the rates recommended by the Treasury.

Mr. REED. Yes; I remember that.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. At that time it was tentatively agreed that there would be no particular effort for the sales tax, and it was quite all right with me. I am not criticizing anybody who wants the specific sales-tax amendment adopted. I am not talking for it, and I am not talking against it. I am talking about the situation that is developing. We are talking and quibbling about a sales tax that everybody knows can not possibly be passed through the Senate either to-night, to-morrow night, or next week. That is the situation.

The Secretary of the Treasury, when he was asked why he did not recommend the sales tax, said to the committee, "For the reason that I know it was beaten in the House and I do not see any chance of getting it through." I remember the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asked for a concrete recommendation for balancing the Budget. We took it without going into it fully.

The bill is now before the Senate. That was only two weeks ago. In all candor I am wondering whether the Secretary of the Treasury has changed his estimate of two weeks ago to the extent of $200,000,000 or $250,000,000. I am perfectly willing to go along. I want the bill passed. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate or of the country, but it seems to me that my good friends who are so much interested in the sales tax are making a very serious mistake if they undertake to prevent any vote that would mean the final passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, replying to the Senator from Idaho, he is exactly right when he says that the question of the sales tax or no sales tax is not the big question. I think I said that when the Senator was not here. The important question is that we want to get some tax that we can add to the bill to raise the amount of revenue that is necessary to equal our expenses—some tax, I say. It does not need to be the sales tax.

Mr THOMAS of Idaho. As a matter of fact, are there not a number of items in the bill as it passed the House which might be reconsidered in conference and which could be adjusted so as to come out of conference with the Budget balanced?

Mr REED. No; I do not think so

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. We have eliminated a number of such taxes here.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. HASTINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I will yield to no one for the present.

I say it is relatively unimportant what kind of taxes we add. We have got to add something or else our tax bill is a hollow sham, because it does not measure up to the necessities. I think, although, perhaps, I may be wrong—and I readily admit that I may be—that when we come to explore the field of possible taxes the manufacturers' excise tax will be found to be the only one that is practicable to meet the situation.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. There were a number of items suggested by the committee—cigarette taxes, for instance—that were rejected, and there were other items rejected that might be a means of raising additional revenue. I am not quarreling with my friend about the sales tax; but it seems very certain that the injection of the sales tax into this discussion simply means delay, until we will be required to provide taxes which will raise about two or three hundred million dollars more, or about as much, perhaps, as we would get from the sales tax, if there had not been delay. The reason I signed the agreement against the sales tax was to end useless discussion and to secure immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. My impression is that the whole situation will become clear with considerable speed.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to state my difficulty in this situation. It seems to be admitted that we are nearly through considering the rates in this bill. It seems also to be conceded that when enacted it will not raise sufficient revenue to balance the Budget. After some of the taxes provided had been stricken from the bill, the Finance Committee held a meeting and recommended additional taxes, and the Senate promptly wrote them into the bill. There are many of us here who are depending very largely, if not wholly, upon the recommendations of the Finance Committee; and in this situation it seems to me, with no recommendation of the committee before the Senate that is sufficient to balance the Budget, the sensible thing to do is for the committee to get together and to recommend to the Senate some additional taxation which will balance the Budget. That is what I should like to have done before I vote upon the question that is now before the Senate, namely, the reconsideration of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware is exactly right in that respect, but it is also true that the Finance Committee can not act intelligently until it knows definitely how far short this bill falls of meeting our necessities.

Mr. HASTINGS. Can not that be ascertained now by conferring with the Treasury Department?

Mr. REED. The Treasury Department can not pull estimates out of the hat. We are only just finishing the consideration of the bill. I have no doubt they will work all night on the problem, but estimates to be of the least value have to be studied. Furthermore——

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, I concede it can not be done in a few minutes.

Mr. REED. It can not be done in a few minutes, but I hope we will have the information to-morrow. Then we shall know what our problem is, and if my dismal prophecy of a $200,000,000 deficit in spite of this bill proves to be incorrect, the problem is solved; we shall not need the sales tax, we shall not need any other additional taxes, we can go ahead and pass the bill, and the job is done; but if my prophecy is right, our job is not done.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] very properly asked the Senator from Pennsylvania if the Senate had not omitted certain taxes which the House itself had adopted. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it was estimated by the Finance Committee this bill would produce $1,009,500,000. The items now in the bill are estimated to produce that amount less $47,200,000, or $962,300,000. It was estimated by the Finance Committee that there might be effected by the work of the Economy Committee, which has been engaged on the task, a saving in expenditures of $231,500,000. That would make a total of $1,193,800,000. The estimated deficit, or the stated deficit, submitted to us by the Treasury itself was $1,241,000,000. The Connally amendment, imposing the 1922 income rates, if adopted, would result in the raising of $1,289,000,000, or $48,000,000 over the estimate.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean that the Connally rates would yield $1,289,000,000?

Mr. GEORGE. No; but they would do so if added to the items already in the bill.

Mr. REED. How much does the Senator add under that amendment if adopted?

Mr. GEORGE. The sum of $96,000,000, which is the Treasury estimate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Let me proceed for just a moment. That added to the items in the bill would give an amount of $48,000,000, assuming the estimates to be accurate—and, of course, nobody can vouchsafe the absolute accuracy of the estimates—over the deficit as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

In addition, Mr. President, I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that the House bill carried the following items which the Senate has not adopted and which the Finance Committee rejected:

Increased tax on consolidated returns $8,000,000, according to the Treasury estimate.

A tax at the normal rate on stock dividends to yield $89,000,000.

A tax on stock transfers, over and above the estimated revenue from similar provisions in the Senate bill, $48,000,000.

Tax on bond transfers over and above the estimated return under the Senate bill, $20,000,000.

Tax on oil pipe lines, $14,000,000, in excess of the revenues which will be produced by the reduced rates in the Senate bill.

Miscellaneous, $30,000,000.

Total, $209,000,000.

That $209,000,000 added to the items in this bill and the revenue that will be produced by the adoption of the Connally amendment will give us $257,000,000 more than the stated deficit by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will let me finish—I very well know that the Senate has rejected certain House rates because, in our judgment, they were not so desirable as the rates which we provide, but they will be in conference; and, if we face anything like the extreme necessity for prompt action that the Senator from Pennsylvania indicates by language and speech, which I must think is calculated to do more harm than good, the conference committee will have it in its power, under the rates adopted by both the House and the Senate, to make up, and more than to make up, the full amount of the shortage which the Senator himself estimates will result from the overestimate made of the rates carried in the pending bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator reads a lot of fascinating figures, and I can only wish that the facts would justify them now, as they seemed to justify them when the estimates were made. The original Treasury estimates were made last November, in order to be submitted at the opening of Congress; they were modified downward in February. We have had no studied estimates since that time. I have ventured the prophecy on what the studied estimate will show. I think we will get those estimates within 24 or 36 hours, and then we will know what kind of a job we have done so far.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Has the Senator yielded the floor?

Mr. REED. No; but I will do that, too.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question before he yields the floor.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. The Senator knows he has presented an amendment, and I have presented a similar amendment, seeking to take care of the situation growing out of the depreciated currencies of foreign countries which are sending their goods to the United States. I think the Senator appreciates that such an amendment would raise from sixty million to one hundred and twenty-five million dollars and would not only replenish the revenue of the Treasury to that extent but also would meet an industrial situation that is very serious. Does not the Senator think that some proposition like that should be adopted in connection with this bill without very much delay?

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; I agree with the Senator from Washington; and I should like to see something of the kind adopted, for unless we do our job here and do it right our currency is going to depreciate as much as the currencies of the countries of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I impose again upon the Senate for what I trust may not be more than a moment, but upon a subject as to which I am attracted in great seriousness.

The eminent Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is an authority both within his own capacity, touching matters of the Treasury, as well as a trusted envoy bearing messages of secrecy and fidelity that the department would desire to have conveyed. We have just heard that distinguished Senator, speaking as a prophet of the administration, tell the Senate that delay caused by the mere confusion or conflict of schedules of taxation fought over in the revenue bill here in the Senate is producing an influence which, as the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania described, is inducing the financiers of the United States, wherever they are, to send out the gold of this country in the large sums of millions to foreign lands. We hear the Senator wail out this catastrophe as being occasioned by the Senate taking time to contrast and contest the varying systems for raising revenue as presented here by differing and opposing Senators.

Mr. President, I ask, have we at last sunk to that detestable depth in the proved patriotism of the country that a set of financiers can proceed to degrade the credit of their own Nation whenever such serves and flaunt the trick to our faces as intimidation to either create a tax that may be to their private profit or to defeat one that might be to the general public welfare?

Mr. President, you who remember the holy law will recall that in the fourth chapter of Joshua there comes the interrogation, "Who are ye who bring forth and cast these stones?" I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, Who are these who are taking the money of the United States and casting it to the sea upon the vessels that shall take it to the different repositories of the world where it may enrich the opponents of America and discredit their own country? Is this gold "earmarked," of which we have heard description, and belonging to some other land? Then it is not ours; it belongs to them; and to frighten our country with the open declaration that such gold is being taken out of our land because of loss of confidence in our country aroused by our delay in the work of shaping a just measure of revenue is a false conclusion. Why is the act of returning gold to its owner cast up to create a terror that can bring on the threat that was intimated this morning of a "panic" in the offing, being controlled by the engineered forces of the financial masters, and kept in restraint only until they shall let it loose. If the gold is that of the United States, and by bankers is being sent to Europe to serve the purpose of destruction of American credit and working the aspect of our gold standard being surrendered unless this body, the United States Senate, shall obey whatever orders may come forth from whatever financial interest may serve their private welfare by dishonoring their own Nation and discrediting their own homeland.

I propound to this honorable body, conscious as we are of the great strength of the statements of the Senator from Pennsylvania; conscious as we are that he is a man learned in what is transpiring amidst the financial manipulations of the Treasury and of those who are its allies called the financiers and international bankers, we ask who are these, in the language of Scripture, who are "casting these stones"? Who are these who are being instructed and now threaten to execute the orders of destruction of the financial credit of our country in the marts of the world? When the honorable Senator, distinguished by years of financial alliance with banking power, summons this body to hastily act and accept the measure of the favored masters, and this is commanded in the name of patriotism, and it is gravely affirmed by the Senator that only by obedience to the demand and as expression of our patriotism would restrain the conduct of these marauders, who are about to assail their own Nation by the demolishment of its credit and in the dissolution of its national honor. Then, sirs, if it is patriotism which we are to take as incentive to action, I ask where is that patriotism on the part of those who, merely because of a difference of opinion in the execution of legislation, would bring upon the Nation that inexcusable fate of reducing its finances to insolvency, strain the quality of its credit to where a panic could be summoned up by the genii of financiers, or by these evildoers work the debasement of our standard of coin and circulation, and dishonoring our commerce and revenues before the world? Are these the international bankers? Are these who it is that claim monopoly of patriotism? If such is patriotism, I place it in the category defined by old Samuel Johnson—the patriotism that is "the last refuge of a scoundrel."

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I have been detained at my office and have not heard the discussion within the last hour, but it seems to me this situation has reached a point where we should proceed with some frankness and some certainty and some understanding.

I am not quite familiar with the rules of the Senate. I have never quite mastered them; but we have a cloture rule here which can be invoked by 16 Senators, with the approval of two-thirds of the Senate, which will stop debate. But in my reading of American history, with my limited knowledge of the parliamentary procedure of the Senate, we are now proceeding under an entirely new theory of government, an entirely new theory of action in the Senate, and that is by petition.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is about to present, but has not presented and it has not been discussed, a proposal for a limited manufacturers' license tax. So far as I am personally concerned I would not approve of that by itself; but, coupled with an increase under what might be termed the Connally income-tax amendment, the two taken together are very worthy of our careful consideration.

But what has happened? Gentlemen who have not discussed this compromise, Members who have not considered the joint issue of the Walsh suggestion—if I may so term it—and the Connally suggestion, have signed an agreement not to vote for either one; and they are sending to the people of America a statement that 35 men on one side and 20 men on the other, in advance of any argument and any discussion, have said that they would not vote for these two coupled propositions. Apparently that settles the question.

I am not a very careful student of American history, and yet I have given it fair consideration—I think possibly an average consideration; possibly a little above the average consideration—and deciding in advance, before debate, before discussion, before consideration, by the signing of a petition, that men will not consider anything at all, is certainly a departure in the procedure of the United States Senate as I understand the history of the Senate.

To-night men say, "This will balance the Budget." To-night men say, "It will not balance the Budget." A very intelligent newspaper, the Baltimore Sun, has stated that we are not within $500,000,000 of balancing the Budget. If we are to attempt to balance the Budget without considering the program that the House has suggested, without considering the program that it has been intimated will be presented here by the leader on this side, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and others, maybe we will hit it within fifty or a hundred or a hundred and fifty million dollars. But if anything is to be done for unemployment, if anything is to be done to relieve what Senators on both sides say is a national crisis of unemployment, it will cost many, many millions more.

If it is true that we have decided this matter in advance by a petition, I submit that that is an innovation in the procedure of the United States Senate. It is an innovation if practiced in the lower House. Maybe it is a good thing. Possibly it may save time; but the question is not one of time. The question is of doing the right thing in the right way and doing it properly. It is not a question of days or of hours. It is a question of deciding a momentous question carefully, with all the facts before us.

Mr. President, after listening to this discussion for some four or five days I am uncertain in my mind as to whether the action of the Senate in supporting the Finance Committee will balance the Budget; and from the President of the United States down we are told to balance the Budget.

What does balancing the Budget mean? Balancing the Budget of the Government of the United States means the same thing that it means to any private corporation or any partnership in the United States. It means a balancing of income against expenditure.

If men can sign petitions, cut off debate, stifle investigation, and in that way settle this problem, it is an innovation in American politics. If anybody on either side of the Chamber has ever heard of a procedure of that kind before, it will interest me historically, if in no other way, to know about it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator states that balancing the Budget of the Government in its common acceptation now, after all the propaganda in that behalf, means the same thing as balancing the budget of a corporation or of a private concern. Would the average corporation attempt to raise from current income, when there is a more or less distressed condition, the amount required for improvements such as our public-buildings program; or would they, if necessary, use securities for that purpose?

In other words, the question of balancing the Government Budget is extended beyond all business practice in connection with corporations or private individuals; and under the circumstances they expect us to raise from current income the money required for all expenditures, even including betterments. Corporations do not do that. Private concerns do not do that. If they are going to put up a new unit in connection with a factory it does not necessarily mean that they have to raise in that particular year all the money required for that purpose.

So I think there is a little distinction. It is a little different from balancing the Budget in private enterprise.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator from Florida is quite right. What a private corporation would do, or a partnership would do, or any other business concern would do is this: They would call together the directors of the corporation or the members of the partnership, and they would hear every element that entered into the question of financial difficulty.

Mr. President, who knows to-night whether this Finance Committee bill will balance the Budget? Is there a man here who can say that it will? I will yield for a reply. If there is a man on either side of the Senate who can say to-night that the Finance Committee bill recommendation, if adopted, would balance the Budget, I would like to have him interrupt me with his thought. I assume, since there is not a reply, that there is not a man in the United States Senate who believes that the recommendations of the Finance Committee of the Senate will balance the Budget as the Budget exists to-day.

But something is to follow, among other things, measures for rehabilitation, new programs for relief, new programs for unemployment relief, which are not before the Senate. Yet apparently we are to decide what the Senate of the United States will do upon a signed petition, a most remarkable procedure. I have been a student of history, to some extent, but I do not know of a similar thing being proposed at any time in our history.

Mr. President, I am not quite sure but that we should have a limit on debate in the Senate. A distinguished Member of this body, John Sharp Williams, at one time had the inquiry propounded to him as to how long it would take him to discuss a question. He considered the matter very carefully and finally said, "It will take me about two hours and a half, but if I were prepared I could discuss it in 45 minutes."

There is a rule in the Senate which may be invoked for a limitation on debate, and frankly, Mr. President, I think it ought to be applied more frequently than it has been applied. The vast majority of the Members of the Senate do their most constructive work in the committees of the Senate. They are hard-working men, who sit in the committee hearings, study the subjects which are placed before them, go back to their offices for further study, and decide; then come into the Senate, and five or six men in the Senate occupy hour after hour of the Senate's time, hour after hour.

Here we have a great question, involving not only the balancing of the Budget but doing a thing in which everybody is interested, a thing in which the business man, the laborer, and the farmer are interested, and we want to do it right.

We have the cloture rule, but now it seems we have a new rule, introduced for the first time in either the Senate or the House—that is, the round-robin rule of signing a petition saying "No more debate, we will decide it in the cloakrooms."

If the Senate, which probably boasts that it is the only free deliberative body left in the world, is to decide its program on a signed petition on this subject, if there may be merit in it, why not decide every question in the same way? Why should we have discussion? Present a matter to the Senate, and then let the Members of the Senate sign a petition saying, "We are for it" or "We are against it," and settle it that way. We could at least save time. It is true it would mean economy of time. It would save us many weary hours of discussion. If that is going to be a new method of settling questions in the Senate, we had better understand it now.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield for a question?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator yield in order that I may make a motion for a recess at this time? It is coming to the time when we have agreed to recess, and I would like very much if the Senator would yield at this time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, it would, of course, be with the understanding that the Senator from Missouri would have the floor at the beginning of the session to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be the ruling of the Chair anyway.

Mr. WATSON. That would be understood.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I can conclude in one minute. I am practically through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, this is Memorial Day. This is a day all Americans celebrate; and after a long day of discussion, after our absence from the graves of old soldiers, we find introduced into the American Congress for the first time a new method of procedure, that is, legislation by signing a petition.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Utah whether it would be possible for us to get a vote to-night upon the motion for reconsideration of the vote by which the Connally amendment was rejected?

Mr. SMOOT. I would be delighted to have a vote, if we can get it without any further consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. I mean just the question of reconsidering the vote on the Connally amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if we should vote to reconsider the vote, it is not the Senator's intention to have the Senate go ahead with further discussion to-night?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, if it should be shown that we could not finish the matter to-night, it would be useless for us to go ahead, but I hope we may vote on the motion to reconsider now.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I hope that may be acceded to, that we may vote on the motion to reconsider, and then recess until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has a unanimous-consent agreement which will terminate this session of the Senate at 7.30 o'clock, unless there is another unanimous-consent agreement to set that aside.

Mr. SMOOT. We also have a unanimous-consent agreement that when we do conclude the business of the Senate to-day, we will recess until 10 o'clock to-morroy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is part of the unanimous-consent agreement.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Utah is willing that a vote should be taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Connally amendment was rejected?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall have to object to the request made by the Senator from Mississippi. Personally, I am as anxious to have a vote as anyone is, but a number of Senators have left the Chamber on the assurance that we would have no vote this evening, and it is within only a few minutes now of the time when we would complete our session to-day, and I think it would be very unfair to take a vote on this matter now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon how such an understanding was arrived at? The pending motion was the motion to reconsider.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah stated to me that he wanted a recess taken after offering about 10 technical amendments. Relying upon that, I told several Senators there would be no vote this evening. I note that several of those Senators are not now present, and I certainly would want to protect them and also observe my promise. Therefore I would have to object to a vote this evening.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if we can not do any more business to-night, according to the unanimous-consent agreement, I ask that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if there was no one to debate the question, let us vote.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has already stated that there were quite a number of Senators who are not here, and who left with the understanding there would be no vote to-night. I myself think that there is no question but what the motion would carry whether the Senators were away or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to reconsider the vote by which the Connally amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Howell	Pittman
Austin	Costigan	Hull	Reed
Bailey	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bankhead	Cutting	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dale	Kendrick	Sheppard
Barkley	Davis	Keyes	Shortridge
Bingham	Dickinson	King	Smith
Black	Dill	La Follette	Smoot
Blaine	Fess	Lewis	Steiwer
Borah	Fletcher	Logan	Stephens
Bratton	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	George	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Glenn	McNary	Townsend
Bulow	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Trammell
Byrnes	Hale	Moses	Tydings
Capper	Harrison	Neely	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hastings	Norbeck	Walcott
Carey	Hatfield	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Cohen	Hawes	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Connally	Hayden	Oddie	Watson
Coolidge	Hebert	Patterson	Wheeler

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote not later than 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning on the Connally amendment.

Mr. DILL. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. Reserving the right to object, does that carry with it the proposal that we now vote upon the question of the reconsideration of the vote by which the Connally amendment was defeated?

Mr. SMOOT. It is understood that that question will be voted upon, too.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is one of reconsideration.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand there is no opposition to a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let us have a viva voce vote on the question of reconsideration.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Utah has requested that we vote not later than 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will not the Senator make it 11 o'clock?

Mr. SMOOT. Very well; not later than 11 o'clock.

Mr. TYDINGS. The reason why I ask is that a number of us have important engagements at some of the departments in the morning. We can all be here by 11 o'clock. I have to be away to-morrow morning for an hour or so.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, what is the question now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair understands the question, it is that a viva voce vote shall now be taken upon the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas was rejected, and that not later than 11 o'clock to-morrow morning a vote shall be had upon that amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Disagreeing momentarily with the usually accurate President pro tempore, I do not believe that the two were coupled together. My understanding was that we are to vote upon the matter of reconsideration, and after that vote the Senator from Utah will submit his unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote now is merely upon the question of reconsidering. Then the vote would come on the main question, which the Senator from Utah has asked unanimous consent shall be taken at not later than 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. WATSON. But that is not a part of the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the way the Chair understood it to be submitted.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his unanimous-consent request and let us vote now on the motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that to be the pending question.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, when I objected, I thought the question was to vote to reconsider to-morrow, and I am opposed to postponing that feature of the matter. I have no objection as I now understand the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has proposed an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] with the hope, which is my hope, that we may vote at the same time for a limited manufacturers' sales tax and the approval of the so-called Connally amendment, because I believe they belong together. I hope that opportunity will be afforded.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, in my remarks a while ago I stated that in view of the fact that a statement was filed signed by 55 Senators that they would not vote for any amendment in any form dealing with the manufacturers' sales tax, I realized the futility of offering any amendment, and therefore would not offer any amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Mississippi. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the question now is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. I had understood that certain Senators had been told that there would be no vote upon that motion to-night. Of course, I would like very much to have a vote if we could do so at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not see why Senators should absent themselves on any sort of assurance such as has been stated. They ought to be here to vote. I wish we could vote now. It is not fair to the rest of us who stay here and are ready to vote to have to postpone votes on account of somebody else who does not stay here and attend to business.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I agree with what has been stated by the Senator from Texas, but I am told that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] assured a number of Senators, based upon information upon which he felt justified in relying, that there would be no vote this afternoon. I feel under the circumstances, much as I should like to vote upon the amendment now, that we ought not to do it. I believe in respecting agreements made under circumstances such as the Senator from Oregon was justified in relying upon.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I shall have to object to the request made by the Senator from Mississippi. Personally I am ready to vote, but I had the assurance of the chairman of the Finance Committee that there would probably be no vote this afternoon. He wanted merely to offer a few amendments of a minor nature. Several Members asked if there would be a vote this afternoon and, relying upon that assurance, I told them "no," and I think they left the Chamber under that impression. They may have returned, but it would be unfair if only one Senator left relying upon my statement when I relied upon the statement of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon knows who those Senators are. He probably knows where they live, and he can very easily get them back here and let us vote. It certainly is not fair to the rest of the Senators who stay here and attend to business.

Mr. MCNARY. It is not a question of fairness; it is a question of practice and custom that I believe in living up to. It is a matter of accommodation. The Senator from Texas himself has relied upon similar statements in the past. So far as I am concerned, I shall make my word good.

Mr. President, there is not anything particularly harsh or unusual about the request that we may vote to-morrow at 10.30 or 11 o'clock. It is not going to delay the matter. It is keeping our good faith with Senators. If only one Senator were absent because of that assurance, I should object at this time to a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator objects to the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. MCNARY. No; I do not. I said that is eminently fair; but I do object, so far as I can, to a vote this evening, in view of the statement I made, relying upon the statement of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I ask the Chair to state my unanimous-consent request.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, in the light of the fact that the Senate is ready to vote, why not have a unanimous-consent agreement to vote immediately upon the convening of the Senate to-morrow after a quorum is called? If we want to protect absent Senators, that will do it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, some Senators in this part of the Chamber asked the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] if we would recess after the viva voce vote. He nodded his head. We understood that to mean a recess immediately after the viva voce vote. At least there was an implied understanding that after we had the vote to reconsider we would take a recess. I hope it will be carried out.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was very anxious that we might vote on this proposition to-night and finish the bill. I had understood from the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] that he had told some Senators that there would be no vote to-night, relying upon what the Senator from utah [Mr. SMOOT] had said. When the unanimous-consent request was submitted by the Senator from Utah, coupled with another proposition, some of us objected. We wanted to have the vote on the amendment reconsidered, and then the suggestion was made that we would vote to-morrow not later than half-past 10 o'clock. So far as I am concerned, if we can vote on either of the propositions, that is entirely agreeable to me.

I think some of the Senators asked about a recess as the Senator from Texas stated, and I probably did as he said, but no one has left the Senate Chamber since that time. They are still here. If we can not vote to-night, we ought to have a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at the earliest possible moment to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I renew my unanimous-consent request that we vote upon the pending question not later than 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senate has already voted to reconsider the vote by which the Connally amendment was rejected, and therefore the Connally amendment is now before the Senate. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that at not later than 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Eleven o'clock!

Mr. DILL. Why not vote the first thing in the morning? We are all ready to vote now.

Mr. SMOOT. It may take 10 or 15 minutes to get a quorum.

Mr. DILL. Very well; then let us vote as soon as the roll is called in the morning.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] asked that we do not vote until 11 o'clock because several Senators have engagements to go to some of the departments. Let us make it not later than 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that at not later than 11 o'clock to-morrow morning the Senate shall vote upon the pending question, which is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. Is there objection?

Mr. DILL. I object.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator make it 10.30?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I did suggest. I submit the request again for a vote not later than 10.30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah renews his request for unanimous consent that the Senate vote not later than 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall not object. I simply want to take a moment to say to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] that I had no desire to impugn his good faith or anything of the kind in assuring Senators that they need not remain here. But all Senators who have been here to-day at all know we are trying to get action on the bill, and all Senators who have been here know of the influences and the maneuvers and strategies that are being employed not only to kill the amendment but that may be employed to put over the sales tax by means of what may transpire to-night, and by what the Treasury Department may cook up to-night and send over to the Senate to-morrow morning. After deliberating all day, I think the Senate ought to vote. I shall not object to the unanimous-consent request, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, we might as well be perfectly frank. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has made three speeches in connection with this bill which, whether they were calculated to do so or not, will have the effect of helping to create both a domestic and a foreign run on the American dollar. During the two and a half years of the depression I have listened to proposals to cure a cataclysmic, fundamental economic breakdown by attempts to change the psychology of the people of the United States. I have contended from the beginning that those attempts failed to recognize the fundamental and underlying cause of the depression in the United States, namely, the wiping out of the purchasing power of millions of American citizens. Granting for the sake of argument the accuracy of the premise upon which the present administration has based its approach to the solution of the problems confronting the people of this country, I say that it is nothing short of striking a blow at the credit of this Government in this critical situation for the Senator from Pennsylvania to rise on the floor of the Senate and make the speech he delivered this afternoon.

The Senator from Pennsylvania now objects to fixing a time to vote on the Connally income-tax-rate amendment. Senators who are maneuvering to put the sales tax in the bill, and its proponents outside of the Senate who do not hesitate to strike a blow at the soundness of the American dollar in order to accomplish their purpose, are anxious that we should not vote upon this amendment to-night, because they know that it would be carried in the press of this country and of the world to-morrow morning that we had put another $100,000,000 of revenue into this bill.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have not participated in the campaign which has been made concerning the necessity of balancing the Budget, but I do say that a situation has developed on the floor of the Senate to-day which enables any man who has observed the maneuvers that have taken place to reach the conclusion that responsibility for the failure to "balance the Budget," according to the estimates furnished by the Treasury Department, and reaffirmed not later than two weeks ago by Secretary Mills, must rest upon those who advocate the sales tax, for the Budget could have been balanced by this time had it not been for the maneuvering for advantage by the advocates of the sales tax.

Mr. President, responsibility for further delay and responsibility for increasing the panic which the advocates of the sales tax have already created in the public mind rests upon the supporters of the sales tax.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah if he will not resubmit his proposal that we vote in the morning at not later than 10.30 upon the Connally amendment? May I say to him if he shall not do that some of us will feel the necessity of making a motion to continue in session for the purpose of enabling the Senate to conclude the consideration of this measure to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate will have to decide as to that. The Senator will have to get unanimous consent, I think, to pursue that course.

Mr. HARRISON. The parliamentary clerk tells me otherwise. However, there is not any use of getting into a broil over this proposition. The Senate is in a mind, I think, to vote on it at not later than 10.30 in the morning.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. REED. I have just heard from the Senator from Wisconsin that this is part of a "deep-laid plot" of my own concocting. My reason for objecting to a vote at 10.30 to-morrow—and the Senate will notice that I did not object to an agreement to vote at 11 o'clock—was that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] stated that he had an appointment that would keep him from here until after 10.30. If an agreement be requested for a vote at 11 o'clock, despite my "deep-laid plot," I will agree to a vote at that hour.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I promised two separate delegations that I would go with them to-morrow from about 10 to 11 o'clock to attend to some very important matters for them, but I will break my word to them under the circumstances and be here at 10.30 to-morrow in time for a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we take a vote on the amendments at not later than 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I merely wish to observe that I did not rise to object, but the Chair ignored the Senator from Texas when he was seeking to get recognition. I merely want to observe, in view of the statement of the Senator from Oregon that so many Senators had left the Chamber, that on the last roll call there were 84 Senators present out of 96, which is a pretty fair attendance.

The unanimous-consent agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That at not later than 10.30 o'clock a. m. on Tuesday, May 31, 1932, the Senate proceed to vote upon the pending amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to the revenue bill.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS

Mr. ASHURST presented a petition of several citizens of Yavapai County, Ariz., praying for the passage of legislation to abate the requirement of annual work upon unpatented mining claims for the year 1931–32, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from Dr. John J. McLoone, president of the Maricopa County Medical Society; Dr. and Mrs. Frank J. Milloy, Marie C. and John G. O'Malley, Bertha L. and E. Payne Palmer, and Frank C. Brophy, all of Phoenix, Ariz., praying for the inclusion of a manufacturers' sales tax in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

ADDITIONAL BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. CONNALLY introduced a bill (S. 4783) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to aid in financing the exportation and sale of wheat and cotton in foreign markets, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

THE FARM PROBLEM

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a radio address by John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union, over the National Broadcasting Co.'s network on May 28, 1932.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARMERS MUST ORGANIZE AND WHAT THEY CAN DO WHEN ORGANIZED

A PICTURE

If I were an artist and you were here where you could see, I would paint you a picture. I am not an artist and you are not here, so all I can do is to tell you what I would put in that picture.

First, I would have a dining-room table so long that, like the earth, it would seem to meet the sky. Second, I would put at the head of this table, as the host, the farmer.

Diverting for a moment, let me tell those who are listening in who are not farmers who the farmer is. The farmer is the man who tickles the soil, and the tables in a million homes have bread. He puts a twig in the ground, and those tables groan with nuts and fruit. He pails a cow, and the festal board is spread with milk and cream. He feeds the pig and the calf, and delicious bacon and roast beef appear. He removes the hide from the stricken horse or goat or calf, and human feet are shod. He shears a sheep, and warm woolen clothes protect you from winter's snows. Tiny fingers of country boy and girl touch fleecy cotton locks, and beautiful organdies and voiles make comfortable the days of summer heat. The next time you meet him, though his garments be coarse and few, though his face and hands be soiled with sweat and dirt, greet him as your friend and give him the honor that is due him.

Returning to our picture of the long dining-room table meeting the sky with the farmer at the head as the host—in this picture I would place on each side of the host, as far as the eye could see, his guests, the banker, the lawyer, the teacher, the preacher, in fact, all kinds of people representing every avocation of life. Even those who make a living by gambling on his products would be guests at this table. Next in the picture at the farmer's table would be the animals of the field, the birds of the air, and the insect pests. On one side of the table would be Mr. Bob White, and on the other side would be Mrs. Jennie Wren. Just below them would be Mr. Boll Weevil, and opposite him Miss Chinch Bug.

All of these people, animals, birds, and insects eat at the farmer's table mighty cheaply. They eat at his table on the basis that the farmer works from dawn to dark putting cheap food on that table; that his wife works longer hours and harder than he does, adding her part of cheap food to his table; that his children work in the field in the heat and the dust of the long summer days helping to put food on that table at less than it cost.

Supposing these guests ate at the farmer's table on a basis that the farmer, like other business men, would not require his wife to be cook, dining-room girl, chambermaid, laundress, and dressmaker. Supposing they ate at his table on a basis that he kept his children in school nine months in the year and the other three provided public playgrounds for their amusement. Supposing they ate at his table on a basis that he took 30 days' vacation each year and charged the expenses up to the food on the table. Supposing they ate at his table on a basis that the farmer had written over his gate, "We open at 9 and close at 3." Then what would his guests pay for bread? What would be the price of a steak?

The farmer has everything that everybody else has except one. He has wealth. As a group, farmers have more property than any other group. He outnumbers any other group. They are still nearly one-third of the population of the United States. He lacks just one thing of being on an equality with his business, professional, and laboring brothers of the cities. That one thing is organization.

ORGANIZATION IS RIGHT

And so I come to you on this Farmers' Union hour to discuss the need of farmers organizing and what could be accomplished not only for the benefit of farmers but for the general welfare of all the people of the Nation. Organization is right. The man who says he does not believe in organization is an anarchist, because all government is nothing more or less than organization. The farmer who says he does not believe in organization ought to go back to the life of primitive man living in a cave, subsist on roots and fruits of the forest, and hunt his meat with a club. When a farmer hitches one mule to a double shovel and puts his hands to the handle he is practicing organization. With two horses to a cultivator he has progressed in the field of organization. With four to the double row, he is modern in his efforts to care for growing corn and cotton. When a young man gets the girl of his choice to go with him to the preacher he is establishing the grandest organization this side of heaven—the home.

God himself is the supreme organizer. He made the earth, the moon, the sun, the stars, and organized them into the universe with each cooperating with the other so accurately that scientists can figure thousands of years in the future the exact position of one planet to another. They move in relation to each other in a degree of exactness superior to the works of the best watch or clock ever made by man.

It is strange how slow farmers are to organize in a group when, as individuals, all their work suggests organization. It is strange how slow they are to organize as a group when everyone with whom they deal belongs to his or her group organization. Mr. Farmer, right in your school district the teacher you hired a few weeks ago for services for the next year belongs to her union. You farmers in that district pay her wages that enable her to pay dues to her State and National union. The note you owe at your bank includes sufficient interest that the banker can pay dues to his union. You call a doctor to visit a sick child to-night and he charges you on a basis of paying dues to his union. The merchant, the lumberman, the hardware man, the grain dealer, the produce man, the barber, the plumber, and the man who embalms and buries you when you die, any and all of these, whether they sell to you or buy from you, deal with you on a basis of paying dues to their union. If you can afford to assist all these in paying dues to their unions, it is a mystery why you hesitate to pay dues to your own union.

ORGANIZATION A CITIZENSHIP DUTY

Our Nation was built upon the rock of popular government. Its preservation depends more upon the people believing that we have popular government than upon all other things put together. The method of expression of the will of the people in governmental affairs has developed into a system of participating organized groups. Hypocrites in high official life complain of Congress being dominated by organized minorities. Each individual group is a minority, but the combined organized groups are a vast majority. Those who complain are organized the most perfectly and have more lobbyists and lobbyist headquarters in Washington than any other group.

All matters coming before Congress or other departments of Government are very similar to cases in court. Every bill introduced in Congress is a suit in which some group files the case in order that they may better their condition or protect themselves against some other group. The bill they are asking to be made a law, while helping them, may injure some other group. The other group becomes the defendant in the case. The only way a group can be a plaintiff and ask Congress to pass a bill that will help them or as a defendant protest against what would injure them, is to be an organized group. Thus organization of each group is absolutely necessary not only to protect the group but also to balance the benefits of organized government.

The highest duty of an American citizen is to take an honest, active part in the affairs of Government. You may be a law-abiding, industrious, taxpaying individual, but that does not mean that you are a good citizen. An alien Chinaman can do that much. The good citizen of a great democracy like ours must be willing to give of his time and money in real service to his State and Nation. The only way a citizen can take part in the running of the affairs of this Nation is to be a member of his own class organization.

Once more I appeal to you farmers listening in and I appeal this time in the name of good citizenship and of loyalty to your country to become, at once, a member of the farmers' class organization of this Nation, the Farmers' Union.

Especially do I appeal to the women on the farm. You can do as much to assist in building up a 100 per cent militant farm organization in each of your communities as the men can. Speaking of the farm woman, I divert again to pay my poor tribute to her.

THE FARM WOMAN

The farm woman is the greatest woman in all the world, made so because the finances of the farm deprive her of any hired help; thus, she becomes cook, dining-room girl, chambermaid, washerwoman, seamstress, and in case of sickness, nurse for the whole family. Besides, she is the main producer of the garden, poultry, and dairy products of the farm.

She is the greatest mother in all the world, because she administers herself to every want of her child—no servants, no governess in the farm home to take the place of mother. The farm woman is all these, and more, too.

She is the greatest wife in all the world, because she is a real helpmate instead of a mere "help-eat." Her rigid household economy as well as her wonderful productive industry make her the greatest factor in whatever degree of prosperity comes to the farm.

She is the best neighbor in all the world. If she has something good, she sends you a part. If you are in need, she lends. If you are sick, she will attend you night after night, the long hours through, to help make you well.

Oh, patient, self-denying farm woman, toiling for others from dawn until the late hours of night, with a heart full of the milk of human kindness, I wish I could half paint the picture of your service and worth!

FARMERS THOROUGHLY ORGANIZED COULD COOPERATE IN A BUSINESS WAY

Last month in my radio talk I described what I saw in Denmark in the way of cooperation among farmers. When farmers are once organized there is no limit to the ways in which they can cooperate. It is usual for them to begin in business cooperation. Business cooperation usually commences with pooling their orders for necessities and buying together. This is legitimate and one of the first lessons in the school of cooperation. There are farmers and even leaders in farm organization who believe this is the end of cooperation, when it is only the beginning. Buying prunes together is the kindergarten department in the cooperative educational system. Business cooperation includes both buying and selling, but has never been a success except where there was first a real class organization.

ORGANIZED FARMERS CAN COOPERATE IN THEIR THINKING

Before there can be any unity of thought in any group there must be organization. Six and a half million farmers unorganized have about that many different opinions on a given subject. Organized, these farmers meet in local units and discuss the problem. Delegates from the locals meet in county units and discuss the problem. Delegates from the county units meet in State units and discuss the problem. Delegates from the State meet in national assembly and the position taken on that problem becomes the composite thought of the whole group. Public officials care little for the opinions of individuals, but for the very reasons enumerated do respect and give great consideration to the combined opinion of organized individuals.

FARMERS CAN COOPERATE LEGISLATIVELY

As already indicated in the first part of this talk, the only way to take part in the running of the affairs of your country is to become a member of your class organization; thus cooperating in a legislative way becomes the most important of all cooperative efforts.

There never was a time in the history of our Nation when the opportunity for farmers to do good in a governmental way was so great as it has been in this session of Congress. For lack of organization they could not do what their numbers and the importance of their business justifies their doing. It is a wonderful record that has been made by organized farmers in this session of Congress considering the small per cent of the whole group of farmers that belong to their own class organization.

TAXATION

The organized farmers have had a beneficial influence in the tax measure that has been framed by the committees of the House and Senate.

If it had not been for organized farmers, the ultrarich would have escaped the large increase in rates on incomes and inheritance taxes. The common people of the country would have had a greater proportion of the taxes placed on their backs. If we had been organized 100 per cent, Senator COUZENS's amendment placing income-tax rates where they were during the war would have carried practically unanimously. The farmers of this Nation who refuse to get in their organization are responsible for the unjust burden of tax placed upon agriculture. If the farmers were organized 100 per cent, there would be such an inheritance and gift tax law as would practically redistribute the wealth of the large estates of this country.

ARMAMENTS

If the farmers of this Nation were organized 100 per cent this Nation would have a very different military program. Since 1913 we have increased appropriations for armaments until they are nearly three times as much as they were then. We have increased until we spend $150,000,000 a year more than the Nation with the next highest expenditures for such purpose, which is Russia. We spent last year $727,000,000. Russia spent five hundred and seventy-nine millions. Great Britain spent $535,000,000 and France four hundred and fifty-five millions. If the farmers of this Nation would get into their class organization 100 per cent, in 10 years the United States will not be spending one-half that much and this Nation's influence would cause the nations of the world to reduce theirs by half.

MORATORIUM

If the farmers of this Nation were organized 100 per cent, European countries would not be granted a moratorium which amounted to their using our money to spend on increased armaments. France and Italy alone have increased expenditures for armaments in the last three years $37,000,000 more than the annual payment of all the countries of Europe due the United States. If these two countries had kept their expenditures for armaments down to what they were in 1927 they could have paid the bill for all Europe due this country and had $37,000,000 left.

Farmers, you can prevent this thing if you will do as the farmers of Denmark have done. Get into your own union 100 per cent.

MONETARY QUESTION

If the farmers of the United States were organized 100 per cent this session of Congress would have restored to itself the power of issuing and regulating the value of money given to it by the Constitution. This session of Congress would have remonetized silver and thus broke the strangle hold the international bankers have on the money crop of this country. There can never be a permanent and secure prosperity until we have destroyed the money power of the country. All public officials now declare we need inflation in this country, but there are few, indeed, who have the courage to advocate any other money than bankers' money, which means that after a period of inflation they can again deflate and bring on the same deplorable conditions. There never was a panic under an inflated period in this country. There never was unemployment or lack of business under inflation.

In May, 1920, with the largest volume of money in the history of our country, prices of farm commodities were the highest of all times. Wheat on the Chicago market was $3 a bushel; cotton at New Orleans was 40 cents a pound. Every man could have a job who wanted it. The international bankers were not satisfied with this condition. To destroy such prosperity they ordered deflation of the currency and restriction of credits.

Our present money system gives the international bankers of Wall Street the power to do this any time they desire. I can not understand how public officials will proclaim this a sound system.

Farmers, it will never be changed until you do your duty as citizens—get into your own class organization. What you suffer now is because in the last 50 years you have refused to organize and do your part in a legislative way.

THOMAS JEFFERSON

Thomas Jefferson bitterly opposed a monetary system controlled by bankers. In his opinion Congress had no power to transfer to bankers or anybody else the authority to issue, control the volume, and thus regulate the value of money. It was his opinion that the act creating the first bank of the United States was unconstitutional. He believed that Congress alone had the right to issue and regulate the value of money. The ultrawealthy of that day and the rich bankers of Great Britain were too powerful a lobby, and the objections of Jefferson and the real Democrats of his day were cast aside. However, at the end of the 20-year period for which the bank was chartered the people were so aroused against it that the bill rechartering the bank was defeated in Congress. The rich bankers retaliated by hoarding all the gold and silver and withdrawing credits to the extent that they forced a chartering of a new United States Bank in 1816.

ANDREW JACKSON

No greater American was ever elected President of the United States than Andrew Jackson. In his first term a bill was proposed to renew the charter of the Second United States Bank. This bill passed both Houses of Congress by a small majority. Andrew Jackson had the courage to veto the bill. Congress refused to pass the bill over his veto. Just as in this day, these rich bankers, better known as money merchants, had control of the press of the country and turned loose the most bitter campaign of misrepresentation against Jackson when he was running for a second term in 1832. It was prophesied everywhere that Jackson would be defeated, but an aroused farmer population went to the polls on election day and voted almost solidly for Jackson. He was elected by an overwhelming majority.

I call your attention to the fact that Andrew Jackson and the farmers of America overthrew and completely destroyed the money power in the United States just 100 years ago. It seems to me it ought to be a source of inspiration to the farmers of this Nation. It seems to me if the farmers of 1832 could take from big bankers the control of the money of the country that we, the farmers of 1932, should solemnly pledge each other to unite in the battle to destroy the present banker-controlled money system of our Nation. Let us pray that one, or better, both, of the political parties may select as a candidate a real American like Andrew Jackson.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Gold is the most cowardly of all money. In time of peril it deserts the people and the Nation like rats a sinking ship.

Abraham Lincoln found this true at the very beginning of the Civil War. He was forced to use Government money and did so throughout the four years of that terrible strife between the North and South.

The first issue of money had written across the face, "full legal tender for all debts, public and private." This money never went below par and the bankers were never able to control it. It is still in existence.

Later in the war the big bankers who had hidden the gold of the country nosed into governmental affairs to where all issues of paper money after the first were not made "full legal tender for all debts public and private." This money went below par, but it won the war. The usury collectors bought it up from the soldiers, farmers, and small business men at as low as fifty cents on the dollar. Then with their control in Washington had it redeemed in Government gold bonds at one hundred on the dollar.

One of the saddest things in present conditions of this country is the fact that after the big bankers for 50 years have established themselves as the biggest criminals in the country our Government officials at Washington still treat them as though they were respectable and counsel and advise with them on every public question. They should be completely ostracized in a social and business way by every decent man and woman in this country.

Jefferson and Jackson were two great Democrats. I can not think of greater hypocrisy than the representatives of big business sitting down to a $5 a plate dinner in a celebration once each year pretending to honor the memory of these two great Democrats. If these two men were alive and in the country today, those same hypocrites would be denouncing them as radicals. They do denounce the money system these two great Democrats advocated.

Abraham Lincoln was the greatest Republican in all history. The only equal in hypocrisy to those Democrats who celebrate Jefferson's and Jackson's birthdays are the represenatives of big business who celebrate Lincoln's birthday. If Lincoln were here, these same hypocrites would be calling him a dangerous radical.

I am glad to tell you that the Farmers' Union believes in Jeffersonian and Jacksonian Democracy. It believes in Abraham Lincoln Republicanism. We do not believe in the Mellon-Morgan banker's money system. We know that a monetary system that completely fails every few years and throws a prosperous Nation into abject poverty is not a sound system.

The other day a friend said to me, "John, don't you know the Constitution guarantees every citizen life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness? Don't you know this is equality and real democracy?" I took from my pocket a silver dollar. I told this friend, "There is more democracy in this silver dollar than all the Constitutions and laws ever written. This silver dollar represents life, liberty, and happiness. The laboring man who went out this morning and came back with one dollar for his day's service had one dollar's worth of democracy, one dollar's worth of life. He could go down to the grocery store and buy the things necessary to sustain life for himself and family. If he came home with $5, he had five times as much democracy, five times as much life and liberty."

At this good noon hour, I say to you, my radio audience, that those who are responsible for an unemployed army of 8,000,000 men and women are the worst criminals in this country.

Arthur Brisbane, May 15, made a remarkable statement in his article in the Hearst papers. It is as follows:

"President Hoover reminds Congress that the National Government can use 'emergency powers' now as in war.

"There is no lack of power in the Federal Government, and the President, with the Russian czar and the Turkish sultan thrown into time's wastebasket, is the most powerful ruler on earth.

"The thing is to decide what ought to be done and then do it.

"We know three things that are needed—confidence, money, and employment.

"The Government has power to provide all three.

"It could print the money needed, and with the name United States of America on it that would be the best money in the world.

"Do you doubt it? You would take any plain piece of paper marked 'I. O. U., $100,000,000, John D. Rockefeller,' and you would not discount it by as much as an eighth of 1 per cent if you were sure of the signature. The world will take Uncle Sam's I. O. U. up to $10,000,000,000, and twice that.

"The difficulty is that our financial powers are accustomed to get their rake-off in the way of commission and interest on any money that the Government creates. The financial powers are also the Government, since they control it. They will not allow Uncle Sam to use his credit except through money lent by them; and if they happen not to have it, or if they are frightened to death, as at present, and can not or will not supply what is needed, except on usurious terms, they will not let the Government operate free of their financial tutelage.

"The President would exercise 'emergency powers' wisely if he would simply say 'what money the Government needs it will print and use without permission from financial small fry that are creatures of governmental power. If that be inflation, make the most of it. But please note that payment with money thus issued will be legal payment of any obligation within the boundaries of the United States.'

"In war there was an emergency for men, their blood, and their lives. The Government did not hesitate to take 3,000,000 men, ship them 3,000 miles, pay them next to nothing, and require risk of life from all of them. The protests of mothers did not count. It was an emergency.

"This is an emergency in which cash is needed. Why must the Government now pay more attention to some asinine financiers afraid of losing profits than it pays in war time to a mother afraid of losing her son?

"The explanation and the fact is that our Government is a financial enterprise, controlled by financiers. We have not had a President to resist that financial power since Andrew Jackson.

"Congress proposes to investigate silver and discover what is the matter with it. The President is said to approve if gold is included in the investigation.

"This country, a great silver producer, fights to knock down all silver's price in favor of gold, produced in America on a very small scale. The amount of silver produced the world over for many years past has averaged less than thirteen times the amount, weight for weight, of gold produced. But gold, instead of selling at twelve or twenty times the price of silver, sells at more than sixty times the price of silver. And of 1,800,000,000 human beings on earth, 1,600,000,000 have practically no gold.

'Just what they are to use 'for money' in buying from us seems a problem. The British have dropped the gold standard and are prospering. We hang onto it desperately, as though our only possession were our few pitiful billions of gold, and you know what is happening to us. You know also what is happening to our gold. Europe, France especially, draws it out of our vaults at the rate of $10,000,000 and $20,000,000 a day.

"Uncle Sam is like an old Fafnir, with a thousand leeches sucking his golden blood."

I quote further from Arthur Brisbane in his article of May 26 as follows:

"Here in America we have what might be called a conservative government by high finance and big corporations."

FINANCING

If farmers were organized 100 per cent the Frazier bill, which refinances farmers, could be passed as quickly as was the two billions refinancing bill for the bankers, railroads, and insurance companies. As it is, the best we have been able to do was to secure a hearing before a subcommittee of the Senate Agricultural Committee and finally get a favorable report. Then we secured a hearing before the whole Senate Agricultural Committee, and I am glad to announce the whole committee has reported the bill favorably to the Senate, in spite of the fact that the departmental lobbyists in Washington testified against the bill. The Secretary of Agriculture, the president of the Federal Farm Board, and the president of the Federal farm land bank are among these locust lobbyists who are on record opposing the Frazier farm refinancing bill.

Farmers, be not discouraged. Continue to insist on your Congressmen and Senators bringing this bill to a vote in this session of Congress. We may not win in this session; we may not win in the next; we may not win in our own lifetime. We are but grains of sand on the shores of time. We ourselves enjoy what men advocated who lived a thousand years ago. Untold millions in the centuries to come shall possess those things we seek to-day. You only reach the high plane of Christian unselfishness when you live to serve. Greed and cowardice control those who refuse to fight for the thing that is right because they see no chance for personal benefit.

At this point I want to thank all of you listening in who have contributed to this cause by writing your Congressmen and Senators or sending in petitions and resolutions. Especially, do I thank those who have contributed financially. It would have been impossible to publish and send out these talks had it not been for your help.

If we are to continue printing and sending out copies of these talks, increased further help is necessary. If you believe in our cause assist us now.

MARKETING

Government investigation and official report of that investigation show that not more than one-half dozen men on the Chicago Board of Trade name the price of wheat each day. The same thing is true of other farm products on other markets. The Farmers' Union protests against such a marketing condition for the products of agriculture.

If this great Nation can establish an Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the marketing of transportation on a basis that the transportation companies may receive cost including every kind of an expense as well as interest on investment, then it can also afford to pass Senate bill 4536.

For your information let me tell you what has happened to the various marketing bills that had been pending in Congress. The last of April Senator THOMAS, by resolution in the Senate, secured a further hearing before the Senate Agricultural Committee, with the three farm organizations represented. The result is a new bill really sponsored by the Senate Agricultural Committee and introduced by its chairman, Senator CHARLES L. McNARY. It is known as the debenture, equalization fee, and allotment plan marketing bill. The committee has unanimously reported it favorably. It provides, first of all, that it shall be the duty of the Farm Board to see that farmers get cost of production for that part of their farm crops used in this country. If this bill becomes a law, it is mandatory on the Farm Board to get cost of production for that part of farmers' crops used in this country. Then the bill gives them three methods that may be used to get cost, or they may use any combination of these three methods: Method No. 1 is export-debenture plan, method No. 2 is equalization fee, and method No. 3 is the Farmers' Union allotment plan.

Every person listening in should write Senator CHARLES L. McNARY asking him to see that Senate bill 4536 reaches a vote in the Senate at once. You should also write to Congressman HAMPTON P. FULMER, of South Carolina, who has introduced the same bill in the House. It is H. R. 11866. Ask him to do everything possible to see that this bill is brought to a vote in the House. Also ask for copies of the bill and get your neighbors and business men in your town to write to the Congressmen and Senators from your State.

The moratorium has been passed. The Finance Corporation was established. The $2,000,000,000 refinancing bill became a law. All this with prices of farm crops steadily going down. All this with the unemployed army continually increasing in numbers. They are now struggling to balance the Budget. Balancing the Budget will have no more effect on the prices of eggs, butterfat, pork, beef, wool, wheat, or cotton than has the other measures passed in this session of Congress.

It is a crime for Congress to adjourn without doing a single thing to restore prices of commodities to where the producer can pay his interest and taxes. It is a crime for Congress to adjourn with a million and a half more people unemployed than when they convened last December.

Write to your Congressmen and Senators and tell them so. Write to them and tell them it is their duty to stay in session until they have passed these remedial farm bills. Tell them there will be no votes for them if they come home empty handed.

The legislation involved in S. 4536 does not cost the Government anything except a little for administration. It does not put the Government into the business of buying or selling agricultural products. It will not cost the Government any more under this bill to see that farmers get cost of production for that part of their crops used in this country than it costs the Government to see that the transportation companies get cost of production for carrying the freight of the country.

In this marketing the other fellow has paid us on a basis of a dollar for our products and then sold them back to us for $2, and now they are trying to collect. We can not pay. We can not buy any more. We can not because we did not get our fair share when we sold. The same thing is true of labor. His toil produced the manufactured goods. His toil transported those goods. His toil has helped to distribute those goods. They sold him $2 for every $1 they paid him, and because he can not pay he loses his job.

The cry of the avaricious wealthy in defense of his greed is that he must have a large part of the Nation's wealth each year in order to expand his business.

The truth is every factory in the United States, excepting malt factories, are larger than they need be. It would be ten times better for the country and for the manufacturers to have smaller plants running night and day than to have the large ones not running at all. Factories and farmers operate at capacity when the farmers and the laborers get practically all of the Nation's income. They cease to work entirely when the farmers and laborers get none of the income. Under our present system the farmers of this Nation do not get one-third of the money the consumers pay for his product. You can not have prosperity that way.

USURY

The high criminal, the usurer, gets most of the net income of the Nation. The farmer and laborer, the factory, and railroads are all slaves to this Bible-condemned creature. There is no such term as "interest" in the Bible; it is all usury. One per cent in the sight of God is usury as much as 24 per cent. It is only in modern civilization that these usury scoundrels have been able to secure to themselves legal respectability. To make their business respectable laws have been passed arbitrarily fixing what rate of interest shall be usury.

If you would like to know the power of usury consider the fact that $1,000 placed at 6 per cent compound usury annually in less than 100 years is $250,000. Under the present usury system of this country in less than 25 years a handful of master usurers will own all the wealth of the Nation. There is not a book in the Bible that does not condemn to hell every usurer. The taking of interest during more than half the history of the world has been a crime. Martin Luther used the bitterest language against the usurer, and compared him with the murderer. For hundreds of years English law forfeited the property of the usurer, declaring him an outlaw, banished him from the country, and disinherited his children. The usurer could not attend public meetings and neither was he protected by law from mob violence.

This session of Congress must deliver farmers from international bankers, usurers, and the stock and commodity exchange gambling dens. Gambling in our products and controlling the money system of the country are the twin evils that prevent any prospect of return of prosperity to our Nation.

THE PENDING TAX BILL

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] on Saturday, May 28, 1932, on the Pending Tax Bill.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PENDING TAX BILL

Last Saturday evening you had the opportunity of listening to a very able speech on this subject by Senator PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi. Senator HARRISON presented his argument in an extremely fair-minded way. His address was not marred in any way by partisanship. On the contrary it was distinguished by a sound, statesmanlike attitude toward the entire subject of taxation and our effort to balance the Budget.

I shall not attempt to make any disparaging remarks about the way in which Senator HARRISON handled his subject. On the contrary I want to take this opportunity to say that as a member of the Senate Finance Committee, sitting on the other side of the table from Senator HARRISON and also watching his efforts to secure the passage in the Senate of the compromise plan suggested by Secretary of the Treasury Ogden Mills and adopted by the committee, Senator HARRISON deserves the thanks and admiration, not only of the members of his own party, but also of my party as well. His votes have been free from partisan bias, free from any desire to secure special advantages for his own constituents. In our work on the pending tax bill we have not always agreed in our votes, but he has taken an honorable and statesmanlike course.

To be sure, we do differ on some fundamental matters, chiefly in regard to a sales tax. He has taken the position that since the House of Representatives so emphatically refused to include anything resembling a general sales tax in the tax bill for us to do so would be in the nature of an idle gesture. Personally, I do not agree with him on this point. I have been informed that a considerable number of the Members of the House who voted against the sales tax are now convinced that it is the wisest and safest form of raising a large amount of money during the coming fiscal year. It is an unpopular tax, because it will have to be shared by everyone. At the same time, if everyone does share it the burden on any given individual will be very small.

Some of those who are opposed to a sales tax are in favor of levying much higher taxes on the very rich.

The argument has been used that England succeeds in raising a large amount of money from very heavy income taxes on the very rich. Many people say, "Why can not we do the same?" The answer is that in England there are practically no tax-exempt securities. There are no municipal bonds whose income is free from national taxation. On the other hand, in the United States there are more than $20,000,000,000 worth of tax-exempt securities; bonds of States and municipalities, school bonds, water bonds, municipal-improvement bonds, which under our form of government may not be taxed by the Federal Government in a national tax bill, and which many of our very rich people are free to buy. Every effort "to soak the rich," as the saying goes, drives more of their money into this channel. In England the rich can not escape, because there are virtually no tax-free bonds. This is why we can not follow England's example. We should be simply killing the goose that lays the golden egg.

As a matter of fact, when we lowered the very high surtaxes on larger incomes in the years after the war we actually received more money from that source because many rich persons stopped buying municipal bonds.

While we are talking about England it might be of interest to state that, like every other country except the United States, she derives a very large part of her national revenue from taxes on beer, wine, and spirits. Professor Seligman, of Columbia University, a distinguished economist of world-wide reputation, has estimated that if we could repeal the eighteenth amendment and derive a part of our revenue from a source which every other country uses we would not have to be worrying about the present tax bill. He believes that taxes on beer, wine, and spirits would give an additional revenue to the Federal Government of more than a billion dollars, more, in fact, than is contemplated under the bill now in Congress. The British put a very high tax on beer. The tax now on our statute books, which is of no avail because beer can not legally be made and sold, is $6 for an American barrel, or about 2 cents on an ordinary pint bottle of beer. The British tax for the past 10 years has been more than $24 a barrel, or about 8 cents on each pint. This heavy tax has caused a reduction in the amount of beer sold; nevertheless, the amount received by the Government in that country of 40,000,000 people is more than $250,000,000 a year. It is very unfortunate that neither the House nor the Senate seems to be willing at this time to legalize beer and secure this additional revenue. Our efforts to tap that source of revenue have failed. So we must look elsewhere.

Like all other Senators I have been receiving an enormous amount of mail regarding the tax bill. It has been impossible to answer more than a small part of it. For weeks past thousands of letters have poured in protesting against nearly all of the rates in the tax bill. No one likes to be taxed. Nearly everyone can find several places in the bill which he thinks will bring disaster to him. Nearly every industry which has been mentioned is sure that to place a tax on it would produce little revenue and tend to destroy its business. A large number of these letters favor the sales tax, because it is felt that it would be fairer and give a more even spread. Perhaps you would be interested to hear typical paragraphs from some of these letters. Here is one from a conservative business man:

"The prospect of greatly increased taxes is a matter of grave concern to me. I recognize the importance of a balanced Budget, which is truly essential if the credit of the Government is to be maintained, but it is equally essential that the Government should first seriously reduce its expenditures and eliminate wasteful and useless activities before it seeks additional taxes. Individuals and corporations have been forced to economize and to try to exist on a lower basis of income, if any, and they in turn should expect and must insist upon a real and substantial reduction in cost of Government."

Now, all of us here in Washington recognize the reasonableness of the statements made in this letter. We agree that it is essential that the Government should first seriously reduce its expenditures. The President made a very serious effort to reduce the cost of Government in his Budget, which was prepared last summer. Several hundred millions were cut out at that time. Then after the Congress had assembled, when it was seen how much more serious the deficit threatened to be than had appeared during the summer, the Congress proceeded to cut still further into governmental expenditures until the cry was raised that we were about to deprive tens of thousands of people of their jobs and add them to the great mass of unemployed. A so-called economy bill containing a program for seriously reducing governmental expenditures was presented to the House, but most of the measures it proposed were defeated on the floor of the House. An economy committee consisting of three Republican Senators and three Democratic Senators has worked for three weeks to frame a plan which will very seriously reduce governmental expenditures if it is adopted. The trouble is that there are some items which can not be reduced, like the interest on the public debt; some items which ought not to be reduced, like the sinking fund which keeps our credit good and provides for the maturity of our outstanding bonds; some items which meet very determined opposition on the part of great groups who are interested, like the pay of tens of thousands of Government employees; other items dealing with payments of disability and retirement allowances to veterans, which appeal so strongly to one's sympathy and have so many advocates in every State of the Union that they are difficult to reduce.

As a matter of fact, the interest on the public debt, the sinking fund, and veterans' relief constitute more than half of all our expenditures for the coming year. My correspondents, like the one from whose letter I have just quoted, frequently urge the elimination of wasteful and useless activities amounting to ten or twelve million dollars Even though they were all eliminated, it would not cause a very serious diminution in our expenditures in comparison with the $500,000,000 needed for the sinking fund, $640,000,000 needed for the interest on the public debt, and $1,072,000,000 for veterans' relief. I have received thousands of letters urging serious reduction in governmental expenditure, but hardly any urging any reduction in these great items.

When one talks about wasteful and useless activities, one runs immediately into the pet hobbies of different groups. What seems wasteful and useless to one group is regarded as absolutely essential by another. For example, there are a number of Senators who agree with me that most of the activities of the Children's Bureau are wasteful and useless, and that this bureau has not justified its expenditures, and that in the States where it does not operate the welfare of mothers and children is just as well or better taken care of than in the States where it does operate. Other Senators absolutely disagree with me in this point and are equally positive that that bureau is one of the last that ought to receive any cut whatsoever.

In answer to some of my letters I have often asked my correspondents to suggest wasteful and useless activities which might be eliminated and whose elimination would produce appreciable saving. The other day I got a letter which mentioned seven or eight items. If it were possible to carry out every one of those suggestions, many of which were excellent, the total saving would be less than one-fourth of 1 per cent.

Many people are urging us to borrow huge sums of money and spend them on public works. Undoubtedly you have all of you seen suggestions that we borrow $5,000,000,000 and spend it on public employment. If we could float a loan at this time we would have to pay at least 4 per cent interest. The interest at 4 per cent on $5,000,000,000 would be $200,000,000. A proper annual sinking fund would be another $200,000,000. Where is that money going to come from? Many of the very people who are urging us to economize and to cut out wasteful and useless activities are urging this bond issue. Yet the savings which they suggest would be much more than wiped out by the more than $200,000,000 which would have to be found every year for the interest alone on this new bond issue. Some people are advocating a bond issue of $2,500,000,000. The interest on that, which would have to be met by the taxpayers, would be at least $100,000,000. The sinking fund would be another hundred million. The taxpayers would have to pay it.

I mention these things because of the extreme difficulty of the problem which we are facing. It is true, as my correspondent says, that "individuals and corporations have been forced to economize and to try to exist on a lower basis of income." Permit me to say in answer to this that any business faced with the terrific deficit of two and one-quarter billion dollars hat faces the United States Government would have to go into bankruptcy. No business could keep on paying interest on its bonds and furnishing pensions and benefits of one sort or another to former employees to the extent demanded of the United States Government. Bankruptcy would relieve any individual or corporation from such a dilemma. But we can not permit the United States Government to be delinquent on its payments and deny all of its obligations to those who have fought for its existence, as would be the case in a bankrupt business enterprise. We are in a position where the most drastic possible cutting of governmental expenditures will not relieve us of placing a new and heavy burden on the taxpayer.

We are trying to pass legislation that will reduce governmental expenditures. We are going to broaden the base of taxation. We are trying to balance the Budget. We would all of us like to see a prompt and early adjournment. The trouble is we are faced with the disadvantages of a democratic form of government. Everyone realizes that a democratic form of government is clumsy. It is part of the price of freedom. A benevolent despot can act instantly and effectively and efficiently. A benevolent despot can get things done in less time than it takes to explain it. An unlimited monarchy can be prompt and efficient; even an oligarchy can act quickly.

But all of these forms of government have in them the germs of tyranny and of oppression. We do not trust them. They destroy liberty. They eventually become careless of the mass of the people, who desire liberty and the pursuit of happiness. The clumsiness of a democracy is part of the price we pay for liberty.

The Congress is not composed of people without human sympathy. As a matter of fact, Members of Congress have more human sympathy than the average person. The Members of Congress are not devoid of an interest in public opinion. Practically all try to please the people who elected them. They try to be representative of public opinion in their States and districts. It is not fair to be violently critical of them because their views do not agree with ours. Perhaps some are more anxious than others to please their constituents. This may lead them to take a special attitude on some matters which annoy us. But this is part of the price we pay for freedom. It is part of the price we pay for representative government.

Here is a paragraph from another letter:

"On all sides and in every conversation you hear these statements: 'If Congress would only adjourn,' or 'if they would only cut out their petty logrolling activities, etc.'"

As a matter of fact, these so-called "petty logrolling activities" are caused by the most profound belief of intelligent, honest Members of Congress that if they can not get relief for the communities they represent, those communities will suffer enormously and thousands of people will go hungry and be driven from their homes. Two or three States are vitally interested in copper. Thousands of citizens in those States are suffering from the cessation of activities in the copper mines. Whole communities are destitute. Can you blame the Senators from those States for using every honest, legitimate means in their power of securing relief for those whom they represent? Is there anything petty in their agreeing to support the claims of other Senators, thousands of whose constituents are suffering from a cessation of activities in oil fields or lumber camps? In other words, is it "petty" to endeavor to protect the citizens of your State when they are suffering and destitute? Is it unduly selfish to try and protect them? When only two or three States are desperately in need of some protective legislation is it not perfectly natural that they should seek to win the support of Senators from States where this form of protection causes a certain amount of hardship? The livelihood of millions of citizens is involved. Is that petty?

The same correspondent says it is due to poor publicity that the average person has not the high regard for Congress he should have. That is not surprising. The public is more interested in reading about unusual events than about ordinary happenings. The people who read the newspapers would not be interested in knowing each day how many hours we work in committee rooms struggling to perfect legislation. If 10 Senators work all day long struggling with the far-reaching clauses of new legislation, that is not news. It gets little or no publicity. But if one Senator gets up and condemns the Pope or announces that he is going to wear pajamas, that is news. We are frequently criticized for permitting a Senator to make a fool of himself on the floor of the Senate and thereby get undesirable publicity for the Senate of the United States. But, after all, every Senator was sent here by the voters of a sovereign State. He is one of their two ambassadors. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he does what he thinks is right and will be pleasing to the people he represents. If he does not represent them correctly, their remedy comes on election day.

Remember this when you see us struggling and fumbling with great bills like the present tax bill: Taxation affects everyone. Taxes touch every pocketbook, either directly or indirectly. I believe that the majority of Senators are earnestly endeavoring to distribute taxes as fairly and equitably as possible in the face of terrific criticism and of an avalanche of protesting letters.

Here is another letter which I have just received from a Wall Street stock broker. He is a member of the New York Stock Exchange. He says:

"You and the rest of the Senate have been in Washington approximately four and a half months, and so far, in my estimation, which is that of an average American, have completed absolutely nothing of a constructive nature. The Budget still remains hopelessly unbalanced, taxes have failed to be properly readjusted, war debts have been left unchanged, trust laws have not been altered, and all other matters which would tend to bring about prosperity have seemingly been overlooked.

"Suppose you and the other Members of the Senate represented a board of directors of a large corporation. You had been called to a meeting to discuss the financial program and to lay out a future program for said corporation, whose budget was also unbalanced. If this directors' meeting had to last four and a half months, you can not help but agree with me that such corporation would have been hopelessly bankrupt at least two months ago. Such is the identical case with the House of Representatives and the Senate as regards the financial condition of the United States. From such a comparison it is easy to see that not one of you is capable of handling the emergency that has arisen at this time. I wish there were some legal way of impeaching the entire House of Representatives and the Senate also. The unbalanced Budget is an indictment of the parliamentary system of this country.

"As a taxpayer from the State of Connecticut, I feel that I share in the salary paid you to represent that State. I am putting you above the ordinary employee of mine, but nevertheless I demand that you show leadership, some signs of intelligence, and help our country out of the mess it is in at present, or I shall be forced to enter politics myself to a small degree, if only to arouse the minds of the thinking public of our State in the coming elections this fall."

This Wall Street broker who criticizes Congress so freely and easily has obviously become more interested in our work recently than he was a few weeks ago. He accuses us of having completed "absolutely nothing" of a constructive nature. "Absolutely nothing" is a rather strong term. He seems to have forgotten that we tried our best to preserve the tottering credit of Europe by passing the so-called moratorium. Perhaps this was not very constructive, but it is generally believed that it helped toward maintaining the economic balance of the world, and by carrying out the agreement made earlier in the summer, when a considerable number of Members of Congress were consulted by the President, had a wholesome effect in preventing a serious panic.

He forgets that, in the second place, in order to help a number of great American enterprises, including the railroads, agriculture, and the banks we created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, gave it a credit of $2,000,000,000, and permitted it to loan money on good security to enterprises that would otherwise have closed their doors and thrown out of employment or impoverished thousands of people. It is generally believed that by lending the Government's credit to this great corporation we performed a constructive service that is being of untold benefit, particularly to the depositors in thousands of small banks. If this was not legislation of a constructive nature, I do not know the meaning of the words. He forgets the passage of the Glass-Steagall banking bill, which broadened the activities of the Federal reserve system, and of the bill providing greater relief for farm-loan banks. It is true that the Budget has not yet been balanced, but I believe that that situation will be adjusted within the next few days. His charge that "all matters which would tend to bring about prosperity have seemingly been overlooked" is a sample of the violent criticism now being directed against Congress by persons who do not ordinarily follow its procedure.

I refrain from attempting any defense of the other charges in this letter because I do believe that it would be extremely wise if the writer of this letter and all other persons took more interest in politics in the future than they have in the past.

The Senate is not deliberately wasting time. The Senate is not a tyrannical despot, like Nero, capable of instant action but actually "fiddling while Rome is burning." The Senate is composed of 96 Senators, each with a general duty to the United States and a particular duty to the people who sent him here. When a majority of the Senators feel that a certain tax in this bill is not justifiable and that tax goes out, we must find another to take its place. When a new tax which we discover raises a storm of protest and the protestants are able to show that we have been mistaken, either in the amount of revenue we thought we could derive from that source or in the fairness of that tax, it comes out and we have to look for another one. To my mind the remarkable thing in the handling of this tax bill has not been the fact that various Senators have struggled to secure the relief for distressed industries and suffering people in their own States, but that such a large number of Senators have been willing to vote for taxes which they knew would be unpopular with their own constituents, but which they believed were necessary in order to help this Government meet legitimate demands made upon it.

Rest assured that the Senate is going to make a determined effort to cut down expenditures and at the same time to try to avoid swelling the ranks of unemployed by adding to them tens of thousands of persons now in the Government service. Rest assured that no new extravagant projects are going to be adopted and that the tax bill, when it passes, will be broad enough to fall on people in all sections of this country, but that the Senate will endeavor to distribute that burden as equitably as possible. I know of no Senator who does not try to represent the prevailing opinion in his State or what he believes to be that opinion. He may be mistaken, but we who criticize him are much more likely to be mistaken than he is. True, he may not always vote in accordance with the desire and best interests of the majority of the people of his State. He may feel that his duty to the Nation is stronger than his duty to his State.

The hard-working, conscientious Senators on both sides of the aisle deserve your support. They are in the midst of a gigantic task. Violent and unfair criticism does not help them. It makes their stupendous problems harder to solve. Have faith in American institutions. Let us all be ready and willing to pay the price of freedom.

Mr. FESS subsequently said: Mr. President, just a moment ago the address delivered over the air by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] on the sales tax was inserted in the RECORD. I want to read a telegram which is interesting as showing the efficiency of radio. This was sent to me from Troup, Tex.:

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT—ANNAPOLIS GRADUATES, 1932

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the nominations of the members of the graduating class of 1932 at the Naval Academy at Annapolis were confirmed by the Senate on May 23. Since that time we have held no executive session and the President therefore has not been notified of the confirmation by the Senate of those nominations. These boys graduate day after to-morrow and their commissions should be given them at that time. I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, that the President be notified of the confirmation of the list of midshipmen nominated to be ensigns in the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

COOPERATIVE GRAIN ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate and the country I ask unanimous consent that a statement from James C. Stone, chairman of the Federal Farm Board, on the attitude of the Chicago Board of Trade toward the cooperative grain organizations be printed in the RECORD. I believe the statement explains itself and is worthy of the careful study of every person interested in the future welfare of agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

PERSONAL PROFIT CHIEF ELEMENT IN HELP OFFERS OF GRAIN TRADE

Newspaper reports of statements of Mr. Peter B. Carey, president of the Chicago Board of Trade, in regard to methods of disposal of the stocks of the Grain Stabilization Corporation indicate an attitude toward liquidation of these stocks strictly in conformity with the long-established viewpoint of board of trade members. They look upon themselves as middlemen, entitled by custom to take a heavy toll from American wheat producers for so-called services, which consist chiefly in the pocketing by themselves of the largest possible share of the consumer's dollar. Every suggestion so far made in the present depressed situation to this board for their assistance has contained as its chief element a personal profit to those tendering aid, either by buying at prices ridiculously below the market or for commissions on huge volume.

Liquidation of the stocks of the Grain Stabilization Corporation under the plan announced June 30, 1931, has proceeded in such a manner that American wheat prices have been maintained at substantially 5 to 15 cents a bushel higher than world market-price parity in the face of the most trying marketing conditions known to any living man. Let the grain-gambling critics explain to the public how and why this has happened.

The croup outlook to-day leads qualified observers to conclude brighter days are in prospect for our wheat producers. Winter wheat reports indicate low production. Spring areas do not promise excess supplies. No wonder the speculatively inclined seek wheat stocks on the bargain counter. The Grain Stabilization Corporation has none to offer on that basis.

Wheat is the only great major commodity which for the last five months has shown a definite upward trend. Its influence under the present favorable statistical position may well lead other commodities to higher ground. That opportunity will not be risked in the hands of people in a group representative of those who have grown rich from the profits gained by market manipulation. The recent disclosures as to the operations of brother speculators in stocks do not encourage the placing of great powers in such hands. The orderly method of distributing as demand arises will be continued.

The public shouldn't be fooled by such attacks on the Farm Board as those of Mr. Carey. Their purpose is not to help in the present situation but to prevent the farmer organizing his business so that he in a measure can control the method under which his products are sold.

SHIPMENT ABROAD OF GOLD

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I have here a clipping from the Washington Star of last evening showing the situation of business in the country as it is affected by the amount of gold being withdrawn from the United States. I ask that the clipping may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The item is as follows:

[From the Washington Star, May 30, 1932]

BROKERS WORRIED BY GOLD OUTFLOW—WALL STREET TRADERS KEEP IN CLOSE TOUCH WITH TAX DISCUSSIONS

NEW YORK, May 30.—Although New York banks and exchanges were closed to-day in commemoration of Memorial Day, many bankers and brokers kept in constant touch with Washington to learn the outcome of the tax discussions there because of their possible effect on the current drain of gold from the United States and the fall of the dollar over the week end. Should the tax discussions lead to a quick balancing of the Budget, they would at the same time put an end to the gold efflux.

A net loss of $90,757,900 of gold, the largest since last October, has featured a series of unpleasant financial events, including a severe decline in bonds, in the New York market in the past week. This latest movement has brought the total of efflux to $284,835,000 since the metal movement was resumed on April 13. As a result of these exports American gold monetary stocks now total $4,207,000,000, a loss of 12 per cent since this time last year.

INFLATION TALK FANS FEARS

This gold flow coincides with fresh foreign fears for the stability of the dollar. These fears have been fanned again by congressional talk of "inflation," which is like deadly poison to Europe. Such "inflation fears" were spurred by the passage by the House of the Goldsborough bill, discussions of a soldiers' bonus to be paid in newly issued currency, and proposals of a huge Government bond issue for unemployment relief. The foreigners' fears also have been aggravated by the congressional failure thus far to balance the Budget.

A study of the weekly Federal reserve system statements during March, or shortly after the passage of the Glass-Steagall bill and the system's inauguration of its Government security buying program, reveals a slight increase in gold stocks. Discussions about the Goldsborough bill, which was passed by the House May 2 and which the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency is considering this week, engendered inflationary fears, so foreigners renewed their gold withdrawals.

NOTE-CIRCULATION FIGURES

The manner in which the Glass-Steagall bill is operating is indicated by the reserve system's statements on March 23 and May 26. On the former date Federal reserve note circulation totaled $2,822,755,000. It was secured by 75.6 per cent gold and 24.4 per cent commercial paper. On the latter date reserve note circulation totaled $2,758,223,000. It was secured by 76 per cent gold, 17 per cent commercial paper, and 7 per cent by United States Government securities.

Since early discussions of the Goldsborough bill began, or between April 13 and the present, $284,835,000 of gold has been exported, despite betterments in other directions, brought about by the Glass-Steagall Act, the open-market purchases of Government securities by the reserve system, the work of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and antihoarding campaigns which have caused circulation to decrease.

Wall Street believes that the quicker the Budget is balanced, by the passage of a sales tax or otherwise, and Congress adjourns, the better off this country will be, because the foreigners' fears of inflation will be allayed and the gold-export movement will naturally subside.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a telegram in the nature of a petition. It discloses a rather alarming situation in the country. As the telegram is somewhat out of the ordinary, I ask unanimous consent that it be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., May 30, 1932.

Senator ELMER THOMAS:

Never before have I experienced or observed such a depressed and miserable financial condition as exists here at this time. Everybody is either broke or going broke, and there seems no end to this continued depression, notwithstanding the patent remedies to restore prosperity brought forth by the economical wizard of the White House. If Congressmen and Senators with their exorbitant salaries, with members of their families on the pay roll, and other sinecures, mileage concessions and privileges, were deprived of all of these self-enacted luxuries and had to go back home and earn a living for six months not one of them would then vote against the soldiers' bonus bill or some other method of immediately increasing the amount of money in circulation, increasing credits and restoring the purchasing power of the farmers. One living in a mansion can't experience the suffering and misery of one living in a hovel. Notwithstanding the enactment of the moratorium on foreign debts due us, the reconstruction finance bill to relieve big banks, railroads, and life-insurance companies, conditions continue to grow worse from day to day. Unless Congress does something to put a lot of new money in circulation before it adjourns, to make it possible for people to meet their obligations, you will experience a revolution of some kind in this Republic within the next 12 months. Congress should be kept in session until hell is frozen over unless some relief is given the people in general.

J. K. WELLS.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I was deeply touched by the telegram just read at the request of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. There can be no doubt that our country is in great distress. Whenever I go home to New York I am pained to see the lines of well-dressed people in front of food kitchens and the sandwich places set up by the city and by philanthropic citizens.

I think the constituent of the Senator from Oklahoma is right. There is such a state of affairs in this country that we must find some way to deal with it effectively; otherwise we do not know what the end may be.

Mr. President, it is not alone the unemployment that causes worry. The business interests of our country are in distress. I hold in my hand a letter written by W. J. Schieffelin, jr., chairman of the legislative committee of the National Wholesale Druggists Association. Colonel Schieffelin says that many merchants have their backs against the wall because of the predatory tactics of price-cutting competitors. He makes a plea for the enactment of the Capper-Kelly bill, which, I think, is known as S. 97. This legalizes contracts between manufacturers of trade-marked or otherwise identified merchandise and their distributors, in order that there may be maintained resale prices which are fixed by the producer.

There must come a time very soon when this bill will be considered by Congress. Mr. President, I ask that the letter from Mr. Schieffelin may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, May 27, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: I remember with pleasure and appreciation your courtesy to me at the time General Andrews was trying to have the liquor regulations modified. My brother-in-law, Frederick Osborn, who is a director of Schieffelin & Co., also appreciated your attitude.

As chairman of the legislative committee of the National Wholesale Druggists' Association, I again desire to solicit your cooperation, this time in bringing before the Senate at the earliest practicable date the bill, S. 97 (the so-called Capper-Kelly bill) legalizing contracts between manufacturers of trade-marked or otherwise identified merchandise and their distributors to maintain resale prices fixed by the producers.

This bill was recently the subject of hearings before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce which voted to report the measure without recommendation. Although the committee refrained from a definite expression of opinion regarding the bill, yet the summary of evidence submitted in its support by witnesses who appeared before the committee is so convincing that I feel sure that any fair-minded person would be deeply impressed with the merits of the bill. In this connection the report says:

"The testimony (of the proponents of the bill) covers a vast range of products and the united judgment was that predatory price cutting on standard goods is an evil which works injury not alone to smaller business, but to every consumer in the country. Abundant evidence was presented to prove that losses through cut prices on widely known, identified products are more than counterbalanced by excessive profits on unstandardized and unidentified merchandise. The rapid concentration of retail merchandising in the hands of great chain-store organizations and other combinations was credited in considerable measure to their cut-price tactics as applied to goods of standard quality and value. Using these as 'bargain bait' they have been able to persuade unthinking buyers that all other goods were sold at similar reductions, while in fact goods which could not be compared were overpriced."

The Senate committee also referred to the report of the Federal Trade Commission upon what is known as the chain-store investigation resolution as follows:

"The report gives ample justification for the contention that the intentional policy of pricing goods below cost is for the purpose of luring people into the store by the appeal of 'cut-price' bargains and then selling other goods, on which the losses, and more, may be recouped. It is evident that such a practice injures the sales of a standard product, since the price differentials create distrust and suspicion toward the product. At the same time the independent retailer is subject to the same injury for if he refuses to sell at the less-than-cost basis of the price-cutting competitor he is accused of asking an unfair price. It is this destructive competition which accounts for the extinction of a host of efficient merchants during the past decade."

Continuing, the Senate committee's report says:

"It was emphasized during the hearings that stable prices protected by resale agreements do not mean higher prices. Many so-called standard prices to-day are fictitious prices, since they are certain to be cut by price-cutting establishments, and the maker of the goods must have a margin for discount to independent retailers so that they will handle the goods. The automobile industry, built entirely on the price-maintenance basis, proves that prices are lowered and quality increased under the price-control system. It was contended that if the same right were given to the makers of minor trade-marked articles prices would be lower in many cases than the cut prices so widely advertised to-day. In other words, stability of prices and not enhancement is the object sought to be achieved.

"The bill only legalizes an agreement as to resale price between the vendor and vendee of an identified, standard product which is in competition with other articles of the same class. That agreement is to-day and always has been legal in such great countries as England, France, Germany, Spain, Norway, Sweden, and others. No question has been raised as to enhancement of prices through this system of business. The agreement provided for in this bill has been held legal in many States of the Union by the courts and it is specifically legalized in a number of them. This agreement was held legal in interstate commerce through a long series of decisions by Federal courts up to 1911, when it was ruled invalid by the Supreme Court in the Doctor Miles Medical Co. case. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes dissented in that decision and stated:

"'I can not believe that in the long run the public will profit by this court permitting knaves to cut reasonable prices for mere ulterior purposes of their own and thus to impair, if not destroy, the production and the sale of articles which it is assured to be desirable the people should be able to get.'"

In using your good offices to assist in securing early consideration of the Capper-Kelly bill you will merit and receive the thanks of many thousands of your constituents among the independent merchants of the State of New York, who have been struggling with their backs against the wall against the predatory tactics of price-cutting competitors, who constitute the only opponents of this highly desirable legislation.

Thanking you for your attention to this request and assuring you of our deep appreciation, I am, with kind regards,

Very truly yours,

W. J. SCHIEFFELIN, Jr.,
Chairman Legislative Committee,
National Wholesale Druggists' Association (Inc.).

PLIGHT OF THE RAILROADS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it is not alone the manufacturers and business people of our country but the railroad operators who are in distress.

I think there has been great resentment on the part of the country because of the payment from the funds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of about $6,000,000 of interest to Morgan & Co. It will be remembered that the Missouri Pacific received a loan of a considerable amount from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation upon the recommendation of a divided Interstate Commerce Commission. The loan was made, and at least a third of it was used in paying to Morgan & Co. the interest due on the bonds of that railroad. That is resented by many of our citizens. But, nevertheless, the problem of the distress of the railroad companies must be faced.

I was much interested in an article I read on Sunday in the New York American, being an interview headed "Fighting Back to Prosperity" with Gen. W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The article gives, from the railroad standpoint, a very good idea of what the railroads are contending with at this moment. I think it is an article which should be read by all of us, no matter what may be our attitude in general toward the question of the loans to the railroads.

We are facing a situation where we have to decide whether we will help the railroads or actually have the country take them over. Some of them are in the hands of receivers and others are likely to go into the hands of receivers. Whether it is wise to permit the breakdown of these arteries of transportation or whether we must use the resources of the Government to keep them alive is a problem which concerns us. I ask, Mr. President, that the interview may be printed in the RECORD in connection with what I am saying.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York American, Sunday, May 29, 1932]

RAILROADS HAVE CREATED NEW EFFICIENCY TO COMBAT DEPRESSION, SAYS GENERAL ATTERBURY—"UNITED STATES RAILWAYS COULD HANDLE 20 PER CENT MORE TRAFFIC THAN IN 1929; COST OF 'MANUFACTURING' TRANSPORTATION REDUCED," DECLARES EXECUTIVE

(By Gen. W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, as told to Earl Reeves)

Our recent economic condition may be compared to a gigantic jigsaw picture puzzle.

There is no swift, easy method of solving a picture puzzle. Patiently, trying and discarding, you fit bits of colored cardboard together until, let us say, the figure of a man begins to merge. Meanwhile, as you work, a relationship between other fragments is seen, and elsewhere on the table perhaps the outline of a house is taking shape. At other points, it may be, you have been fitting together a tree, a barn, a wagon, and so on.

As these isolated portions grow it can be seen now that they bear a relationship to each other, and the piecemeal assembly can continue more rapidly and with greater certainty.

There is no other kind of "solution" for a major depression.

Such a depression presents a puzzle of baffling intricacy. However, the chief industries—steel, motors, transportation, and others—gradually bring about order and coherence in their respective fields. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation halts the bankruptcy rate and gives businesses a chance to rebuild. Through the Federal reserve system and the Glass-Steagall bill problems of banking and credit are attacked.

The President, governors, mayors, and their staffs come to a realization that government can be no exception; that costs must come down. Congress meanwhile struggles with taxation. Everywhere crises are being met, analyzed, and put in the way of solution. There can be no quick magic about this.

However, it will be noted that achievement of governmental economy affects industrial activity and employment; and these in turn react upon governmental income. Increased industrial efficiency helps trade and transportation. Establishment of stability among business enterprises reacts favorably on banking and credit. Restoration of credit and confidence is seen to bear a relation to all phases of activity.

TRANSPORTATION NEVER AS EFFICIENT AS IT IS TO-DAY

Those portions of the gigantic picture puzzle which are solved or in process of solution begin to fit each into the other.

We have made truly great progress in the last few months in the piecemeal solution of the many problems which confronted us.

As for transportation, I can say that it was never so efficient as it is to-day.

The railways of America to-day could handle a volume of business 15 to 20 per cent greater than the peak load of 1929.

When you consider that in the country's gigantic railway system spectacular changes are impossible, and gains must be made through fractions of new efficiency—here, there, everywhere; and when you recall that the depression and new types of unregulated competition have largely wiped out the margin of earnings that ought normally to be available for new facilities; then, I think, it must be conceded that the achievement in these adverse years of an increased capacity to serve the public constitutes a noteworthy performance.

Due to our financial inabilities we have had to seek efficiency through better team play, harder brain work, a higher grade of railroading men, rather than machines, to make a railway system great.

And, incidentally, I would like to say that I think America's railway executives and railwaymen are a very able and public-spirited group.

DECREASE—RAILROADS HAVE CUT COST OF TRANSPORTATION

Steadily American railroads have decreased the cost of manufacturing transportation. We "manufacture" transportation in ton-mile units; that is to say, in terms of the job of carrying 1 ton 1 mile.

On the Pennsylvania system, while freight revenue showed a gain of nearly $100,000,000 between 1921 and 1926—a peak year—we drove costs down from 11.1 mills to 8.2 mills per ton mile. We had increased volume, which naturally aids unit cost reduction.

But between the 1926 freight peak and 1930 we lost more than $100,000,000 of freight volume, and yet in the face of that handicap we forced the unit cost on downward to 7.2 mills.

Taking a longer view of progressive efficiency, I estimate that it would be possible for the Pennsylvania Railroad now to do a 1921 volume of freight business with 75,000 fewer freight cars.

Throughout the decade of progress which followed soon after the war American railways not only have made notable gains by adding new and more modern equipment to the extent that available funds would permit, but also have undertaken many significant researches into new kinds of equipment and new methods of transportation.

For instance, I had been impressed during the war by the possibilities of lighter, higher pay-load cars by an examination of the material in a wrecked Zeppelin in France, and have since experimented with aluminum alloys. What may be accomplished in this direction and in the use of new steel alloys is a matter of continuing study.

As another example, we have just ordered for experimental purposes a 2-unit Deisel-powered car, whose pneumatic rubber-tired wheels run on standard steel rails. Such cars may reduce costs on short-haul, light-traffic runs. They may not. Only actual service will tell.

Tests are also being made for an all-roller-bearing locomotive. It is yet to be proved whether its higher efficiency counterbalances its higher cost. We have already accumulated considerable experience with roller-bearing cars and know pretty definitely the results of their use in terms of comparative fuel consumption, shop and service costs, comfort, and other factors.

We want to know what an all-roller-bearing locomotive will do in terms of operating costs per mile as well as of ton-miles of service it can show in a year.

Generally speaking, recent improvements in railroad efficiency have come not only from improved equipment but from better use of equipment. We use more powerful engines than a decade ago and haul longer trains at higher speeds. We have concentrated on making equipment work a longer day and more days in the year.

An illustration: We installed larger tanks on our tenders so trains need stop less frequently. It costs something to stop and start a train, but that is not the important factor; far greater gain comes through more continuous use of a railway plant which has cost two and a half billion dollars.

That is the test for all railroads to-day. It is a test which has been accentuated by the depression.

These are the public's railways of which I speak. They are largely owned by the people and they are operated for them. Stockholders of the Pennsylvania Railroad alone now number nearly a quarter of a million, and there is similarly wide ownership of other systems. Savings banks and life-insurance companies, which invest money for tens of millions of persons, own railway securities of a value equivalent to one-quarter of the net capitalization of the railways.

Whereas in older countries the placing of industrial, commercial, and population centers was determined by ports, rivers, and canals, railway facilities built the United States. As a result the average American must have each year and is dependent upon ten times as much rail transportation, in ton-miles hauled, as is the average Englishman or Frenchman.

There was a period a few decades ago when rate and rebate wars in competition for traffic demoralized both the railways and industries. No manufacturer knew how to price his goods. He did not know what railrate his competitor was getting.

In chaotic and blind competition railways and industries slashed rates and prices to the point where loss of income for both was ruinous. Insolvency for many was the result. Then we decided to set up standards and to regulate railway operation—establish fixed, published rates.

History is repeating itself in respect of unregulated competition of other forms of transportation, with identical results, for railways and industry alike. For the railroads, rate competition which they are not allowed to meet; for industrial plants, again secret uncertain rates—often wholly unjustifiable economically—leading to competitive, unsound, and ruinous price cutting. When this happened before railways and industries were headed for the bankruptcy court.

Highway transportation companies—including bus and truck concerns—operate to-day over roads built by the taxpayers—of which the biggest is the railroad—having to meet no roadway-maintenance charges. They do not have to maintain regularity of service or observe uniform transportation safety regulations or maintain fixed wages or definite employment hours.

They can accept only the cream of the traffic, when they will, and discard or refuse to carry other traffic; and this they haul over a public transportation system of highways which cost twenty-six to twenty-eight billion dollars, in unregulated competition with a $26,000,000,000 railway plant. They are not required to publish or maintain minimum rates or live up to any prescribed standards of operation and service.

A Washington official asked me if in seeking for highway transportation regulation I want the truck "regulated out of business." My reply was, of course, no. As a matter of fact, the Pennsylvania Railroad is doing business to-day with a number of trucking companies in various cities, and these operations are generally profitable.

When you say that the railways to-day are "privately owned" the phrase means only that they are not owned by the Government. Tens of millions of persons share in their ownership, directly or through savings and insurance.

The public is also vitally interested in the industries which are affected by chaotic conditions in the highway transportation business, and one hundred and twenty millions are directly affected by the "health" of railways and industry alike.

As a matter of public policy, therefore, I have contended that highway and water transportation alike should come under some kind of regulation—equitable regulation—which would place all forms of transportation on an equitable basis. Then the economically justified ones will survive and each will be in a position to perform those kinds of services for which it is best fitted. They themselves and the public will be both better protected and better served.

Fair competition is, it seems to me, a challenge, a pacemaker.

The airplane became a competitor of the railways. Between New York and Washington two or three hundred persons fly daily. I think we'll get that traffic back when electrification enables us to cut that run to four hours, perhaps even to three and a half hours.

The truck performs for business certain services which the railway did not perform well enough. So we developed and recently started use of a "demountable truck body." In it a shipper loads his goods, it is trucked to the station, carried by rail, transferred again to a truck, and delivered to consignee without rehandling en route.

EFFICIENCIES—ADVERSITIES TAUGHT USE OF THEM

That offers door-to-door service, plus regularity of service which railways alone provide. We also have developed container service which is adaptable to store-door delivery like the truck body.

Because of new efficiencies, which adversity helped teach us, I look forward confidently to a day when, normal economic conditions having been restored, the railways will carry far greater traffic than ever before and perform their service at less cost to the public.

Confident of its future, the Pennsylvania Railroad, notwithstanding the depression, launched several years ago a $300,000,000 betterment program, including the $100,000,000 project of electrifying our New York-Washington route.

The late E. H. Harriman wished that he might widen the gauge of all the railroads so that heavier engines and larger cars might be able to take care of future traffic demands which he foresaw. Without a wider gauge we have met every peak of demand upon us.

The next great advance, for trunk lines in dense-population areas, will be through electrification. Our present "average" freight train is of 60 cars and, stops included, averages 14 miles per hour. Electric units—probably two coupled together for the New York-Washington run, which is without sharp grades—will haul 125 cars, a train 1 mile long, and maintain an average of 25 miles.

The most modern type of steam locomotive costs around $80,000. Two electric motive-power units will cost half again as much. But with a relatively small increase in the total of capital employed, and no increase in trackage, we shall be able to double our track capacity on the New York-Washington line. By getting greater use out of mobile equipment we shall obtain results in increased capacity equal to or perhaps greater than could have been obtained by laying down a third line of track between these two cities.

We consider the project important and necessary alike to our freight and passenger business, because of the probable growth of the metropolitan area to a population of 30,000,000 and the growing importance of southern passenger business.

In conclusion, I would point out that the railways are and will continue to be the backbone of our transportation system. There is nothing in sight which can supplant them. They have shown confidence in themselves and in the future of America. They have built steadily for better service in better days to come. They were never as efficient as they are to-day. They are the public's railroads. And the public's conception of what is equitable public policy can advance or retard them.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is another matter which is occupying the thought of many Members of the Senate. I refer to pending bills relating to the independence of the Philippines. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 23, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] had inserted a letter written by former Governor General Forbes to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. It will be recalled that Mr. Forbes has been in opposition to granting freedom to the Filipinos. When this letter was inserted in the RECORD, the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] made this statement, which I find on page 10881 of the RECORD:

The ambassador's indorsement of Senate bill 3377 is most welcome; his approval will clarify the situation and make more certain a settlement.

Mr. President, I do not find that indorsement of the bill in anything included in the letter to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. Mr. Forbes said in that letter:

While I personally believe that the interest of the Philippine Islands would be best served by a continuance of American sovereignty, under the present law, with such changes and alterations in the development of self-government as conditions may counsel, I can not but recognize the fact that, with the strong feeling manifested by the recent vote in the House of Representatives, and which I understand prevails likewise in the Senate, some steps will undoubtedly be taken by our Government to end the present uncertainty and stabilize the situation in the Philippines.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Evening Transcript of Boston of Thursday, May 12, relating to an address delivered by Ambassador Forbes before the Boston Chamber of Commerce, and in it I find this quotation from the ambassador:

It is a pity that the islands can not be permitted to continue to progress as heretofore; but, if a change is to be made, this form—

Referring to the bill pending—may prove to be the least harmful and may turn out a workable solution of a difficult problem.

I ask that the clipping may be printed in the RECORD in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clipping referred to is as follows:

FREE ACCESS TO ASIA AS UNITED STATES POLICY

(Advocated by W. Cameron Forbes in address before Boston Chamber of Commerce)

Emphasizing the importance of adequately protecting and permanently assuring American interests in the future development of the trade routes of the Pacific, W. Cameron Forbes, former ambassador to Japan, told the members of Boston Chamber of Commerce, at a luncheon this afternoon, that free access to the shores of Asia, especially to China and the great population found there, ought to be a cardinal principle of the national policy of the United States.

The speaker, who recently returned to his home in Norwood on his retirement after almost two years in the Diplomatic Service, referred to the strategic position of the Philippine Islands and criticized the legislation now before Congress to grant them independence. He asserted that the Philippines, of which he was once Governor General, had vastly more freedom now than they would have under their own government, and that the movement for their independence was being promoted in the United States by certain sugar, cordage, labor, and dairy interests. He also discussed briefly the Sino-Japanese situation, expressing the view that the United States should deal sympathetically and maintain friendly relations with both countries.

"Let us picture the great continent of Asia," he said, "on the eastern and southern shores of which dwell the huge populations of China and India, numbering nearly 800,000,000 people, and fringed or fenced off from the Americas by a line of islands running from Kamchatka on the north to the great island of Borneo on the south. The upper two-thirds of this group belong to Japan and the lower third belongs to the United States. As a result of the treaty of Versailles and the action of the League of Nations in granting a mandate to Japan, practically all the islands on the path between Hawaii and the Philippines, with about three exceptions, are now under management of Japan, mostly under mandate from the league.

"The Philippine Islands have now been managed by the United States for 34 years; and while no one can deny that our work could have been done better, I am ready to assert and maintain that it could have been done very much worse, and that the progress made by the Philippines under our direction has compared favorably with the progress made by the dependencies of other countries in other parts of the world.

OPENED MARKETS TO FILIPINOS

"I think whatever success we have had has been due largely to the fact that we have genuinely tried to win the respect and friendship of the Filipinos, have given them social recognition, and hence have had less of the racial antipathy to contend with which hampers the success of all who go to another country and deal with the inhabitants as though they regarded them as inferiors.

"Perhaps the greatest factor in making a prosperous people of the Filipinos has been the fact that we have opened our markets to their products and given them a substantial free trade between their country and ours. The growth under these institutions has been phenomenal and now reaches the sum of $200,000,000 a year in reciprocal trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States. And there is no reason why, if the population should double again as it has at least once under our administration, that figure should not in the next 30 years double and perhaps quadruple itself. We have none too many free markets for our commodities, and business in general is not so encouraging that it seems the part of wisdom to shut off such promising markets as we are fortunate enough to have. But that is exactly what we are setting out to do by legislative changes in regard to the Philippines now under consideration in Congress.

"It is surprising to one who knows the facts to have our newspapers and political leaders constantly talking about giving the Filipinos 'freedom.' They have freedom now, vastly more than they would have under their own government. They have freedom of opportunity, of movement, of speech, of worship, and of employment. They have free access to our markets and to our shores.

"The Filipinos have an entirely natural desire to manage their own affairs. Their leaders have repeatedly asked for independence, and there is little doubt that many of the people themselves actually believe that they want it. The measures now under consideration in Congress would limit the amount of products they could bring into the United States and to a large extent exclude the Filipinos admission to this country, besides turning over their government to themselves—something which might result in much more of an oligarchy than the form of government they now enjoy.

"These proposed legislative measures are being actively supported by certain interests in the United States, not for the benefit of the Filipinos but for the benefit of their own enterprises. These interests can be roughly grouped as those of sugar, cordage, labor, and dairy products.

LIMITATION ON PRODUCTS

"The bill now before Congress places a limitation on the amount of products competitive with those interests which can henceforth be brought in free of duty from the Philippine Islands. It provides for a commonwealth, with officers in all departments chosen wholly by the Filipinos, but with the work of government carried on under the supervision and sovereignty of the United States, which would maintain a 'high commissioner' to represent the President and to retain power of intervention. This arrangement would continue for a number of years, as yet undetermined, after which a gradually increasing tax is to be placed on Philippine products exported to the United States. When this tax reaches a quarter of the tax paid on the same products coming from other countries, the Filipinos can then vote whether to continue as a commonwealth under our protection or to have complete independence. It is a pity that the islands can not be permitted to continue to progress as heretofore; but if a change is to be made, this form may prove to be the least harmful and may turn out a workable solution of a difficult problem."

Mr. Forbes said it was the failure of the Chinese Government to give adequate protection to the lives and property of Japanese citizens that caused the Japanese military activity in Manchuria. He said there was no question but that the whole Japanese people were convinced of the necessity of the move in Manchuria.

"The situation in Shanghai is quite different," he continued. "The clash which occurred there was regretted by both countries. My contact with prominent Japanese in public and private life led me to believe that they genuinely regretted the whole Shanghai episode; were sorry that their military and naval officers had felt it necessary to move in, and were hoping that conditions could be made such that the troops and ships could be withdrawn at the earliest possible moment. Recent accounts in the newspapers indicate that an accord has been reached and that the withdrawal from the vicinity of Shanghai is actively taking place.

"Now, what is the position of the United States? We are friends of Japan and intend to continue to be friendly to Japan. We may disapprove of some of the things which the Japanese have done, but that need not jeopardize our friendly relations.

"The condition of affairs in China is extremely complex. The Chinese have been torn by civil dissension; their different leaders maintain armies in the aggregate larger than those of almost any other country; and, moreover, there is a dangerous red menace. The policy of the United States has been to keep on friendly terms with the de facto government or governments there.

ALL "PURELY DEFENSIVE"

"Both China and Japan have used warlike means in the settlement of their differences without actually declaring war, each country claiming that its actions were all purely defensive and charging the other with offensive movements. History will be the judge of the merits of these controversies.

"Our duty in the present is clear: To deal sympathetically with both countries, to maintain friendly relations with both, and to wait, taking every possible occasion to pour oil on the troubled waters, until the war fever shall have died down and calmer moods and counsels prevail.

"What I desire particularly to emphasize here before the members of the chamber of commerce is the importance of all these events as bearing upon the future trade of the United States. With our high-tariff wall, our vast internal activity, and the small proportion of our products which we export we are apt to forget the importance of maintaining our trade routes.

"The trade of the Atlantic Ocean is near enough at hand to be much in our eye. But the Pacific trade of the future is likely to be vastly more important. To begin with, the Pacific is much greater; there are greater populations bordering on it; and there is little doubt that with the passage of time it will become the principal theater of the world's commerce.

"Perhaps you have wondered why I have laid so much stress upon the Philippine Islands. The German high authorities in 1898 went on record as believing that in the long run the control of the Pacific would lie with that country which controlled the Philippines. We do not want to control the Pacific. We want it free. We do, however, want to protect our trade lines. And we must remember that free access to the shores of Asia, especially to China and to the great populations to be found there, ought to be a cardinal principle of our national policy. It behooves us to 'watch our step' very carefully and to make sure that the interest of the United States in this important future development are adequately protected and permanently assured."

Mr. Forbes, whose address was broadcast over a nation-wide radio chain through station WEEI, was introduced by Frederic S. Snyder, president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce. Others at the head table included Arthur Wilson, vice president of the Norwood Chamber of Commerce; Courtenay Crocker, president of the Japan Society of Boston; former United States Senator William M. Butler, Dr. Karl T. Compton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Representative Eliot Wadsworth, Traffic Commissioner Joseph A. Conry, B. Nason Hamlin, H. Yatsuhashi, W. Eugene McGregor, Edwin S. Webster, Carl P. Dennett, Thomas N. Perkins, Matt B. Jones, Edward J. Frost, H. Addington Bruce, Raymond Emerson, and Rex T. Crandall.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, personally, I am so thoroughly convinced that we have no constitutional right to alienate sovereignty that I can not view with complacency the bills which are pending. I know I stand almost alone in this matter, but I believe that if any open-minded Senator were to study all the literature, all the Supreme Court rulings and all the facts relating to the transfer of the Philippines and the alienation of sovereignty, he could not vote for any bill for independence, even though it might create throbs in his heart in his desire to grant independence to any people wishing it.

Now I yield the floor to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement the vote comes in five minutes, and I wish to embrace this opportunity to ask to place in the RECORD alongside the vote a series of tables vindicating the claim that the rates proposed in the amendment, which is about to be voted on, will not drive the higher incomes into tax-exempt securities.

I offer first a table showing from the statistics of the Treasury Department for 1922 to 1930 in the case of all estates reporting estate taxes that from 1922 the percentage of tax-exempt securities to the gross estate was 3.59; in 1923 4.38; in 1924, 4.62; in 1925, 4.40; in 1926, 6.23, and so on. I ask, Mr. President, that this table may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

TABLE No. 1.—Showing percentage of tax-exempt securities to total estate, compiled from Treasury statistics

STATISTICS OF INCOME, TREASURY DEPARTMENT

Year	Number of estates	Gross estate	Per cent of gross estate tax exempt
1922	12,203	$2,879,372,168	3.59
1923	13,013	2,494,978,471	4.38
1924	12,403	2,550,248,894	4.62
1925	14,013	2,958,363,744	4.40
1926	13,142	3,386,266,616	6.23
1927	9,353	3,173,235,017	5.19
1928	8,079	3,503,238,684	5.61
1929	8,582	3,843,514,150	5.06
1930	8,798	4,108,517,490	6.06

Mr. CONNALLY. I also offer table No. 2 showing that under the rates carried in the amendment, incomes in 1922 from $10,000 a year up showed only a negligible amount of such income from tax-free securities.

Table No. 3 is offered to vindicate the claim that the rates in the amendment when in force in 1922 did not have the effect of decreasing the total taxation from income. In 1922 the gross amount of net income was $21,000,000,000; in 1923, under the rates now proposed, it increased to $24,000,000,000, or more than 10 per cent in a single year, and in 1925 it increased to $25,000,000,000.

Table No. 4 shows, strange to say, that more investments have been made in tax-exempt securities when the surtax rates were lower than were made in tax-exempt securities when the surtaxes were high. That is explained by the fact that when business is prosperous and is booming, as it was in 1924, 1925, and 1926, incomes were invested in stocks and bonds which brought a higher return and then in periods of slump they went, some of them, into tax-exempt securities. I ask unanimous consent that all the tables to which I have referred, and also table No. 5, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables referred to are as follows:

TABLE No. 2.—Showing rates in Connally amendment did not drive money into tax-exempt securities in 1922

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of filing a motion to reconsider, for the reason that the Finance Committee and the Secretary of the Treasury are still in conference with respect to various taxes that it may be necessary to apply to balance the Budget.

For example, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the adoption of the amendment just adopted by the Senate will add $70,000,000 to the revenue. He estimates that up to last night, and prior to the adoption of this amendment, the Budget was short some $285,000,000 because of decreased estimates on the items now in the bill and because of decreased revenues otherwise.

Mr. REED and Mr. HOWELL addressed the Chair.

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I think it is only fair to the Secretary to state that——

Mr. COUZENS. Just a minute. I should like to complete my statement. Perhaps I will be fair to him before I get through. I am not disposed to be unfair to the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair make a statement to the Senator from Michigan: Having already reconsidered this amendment once, it will take unanimous consent to reconsider it a second time, under the rule.

Mr. COUZENS. Then I perhaps shall have to change my request. However, so far as I have been able to learn, the Finance Committee have no disposition not to provide for additional revenue. The committee have not decided on one of the taxes that the Secretary recommended that they in turn should recommend to the Senate. So, in view of the unanimous-consent agreement we had last night, of course, we could not avoid this vote at this time; but I do think, in view of what the Secretary has said, that it came rather too early.

In addition to this amendment, which it is estimated will bring in $70,000,000, the Secretary recommended a gasoline tax to bring in $150,000,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. Just a minute until I finish my statement.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator think it is fair to mention the second recommendation first instead of mentioning the first recommendation first?

Mr. COUZENS. But just a minute. If the Senator will wait until I complete my statement, he probably will see what I am trying to say.

He recommended a gasoline tax, estimated to bring in $150,000,000, and go back to the theater rates formerly recommended, estimated to bring in $55,000,000. That would bring the total estimated returns to $275,000,000. That was the only recommendation he made, with absolute figures.

To comply with the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, I wish to say that after recommending the adoption of the Connally amendment, the Secretary recommended the sales tax, as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, but he gave no estimates as to that, nor did he state what other taxes might be eliminated from the bill, because he had not had time to make an estimate. The only estimate was the estimate I have given, of $275,000,000. Prior to making that, he did recommend the adoption of the income-tax rates which we have just adopted, and the sales-tax provision presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, but no figures were advanced as to what that would accomplish, or what other items we should take out of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that the Senator is stating in part the observations made by the Secretary, I think he should supplement the statement by further adding that the Secretary said that if a sales tax were levied, it should be for one year.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think that suggestion was made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. I do not recall that the Secretary made that statement; but I think it is immaterial. The suggestion was made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] as to how it would be if that were applied for one year, and the Secretary of the Treasury concurred that it might be all right. I do not know whether it is desirable to reconsider, or to take up the new schedule of income-tax rates, but I think we might let things remain as they are until we have gotten through discussing these rates with the Secretary. We have not concluded our hearing. I therefore ask unanimous consent that we may reconsider the vote just taken, if it is found necessary, after we get through with the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if it becomes necessary to reconsider the vote, the Senator can ask unanimous consent just as he could now. I do not see any necessity for getting unanimous consent in advance, in this way. Let us see what the Secretary has to say; then the Senator can make the request.

Mr. COUZENS. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may have the floor for a moment or two, I think it is only fair to the Secretary to add that he recommended the manufacturers' excise tax, as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, very strongly, and that the second alternative he gave was, he said, far less satisfactory. He recommended the manufacturers' tax because it would be accepted as a symbol by the country and by the world that we were putting the tax on a broad, firm basis, which would make the balancing of the Budget no longer a matter of any doubt.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I arose before the roll call was begun, and addressed the Chair, and in doing so I was in order. I had an amendment which I wished to offer to the pending amendment by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

As will be recalled, in the bill which passed the House it was proposed that the tax on the first $4,000 of an income was to be 2 per cent. The Finance Committee raised it to 3 per cent. The Connally amendment raised it to 4 per cent. I do not believe we are justified in levying a 4 per cent tax on a $4,000 income.

My purpose was to offer an amendment proposing that we accept the rate recommended by the Senate Finance Committee, but I was refused the floor and the vote was taken. I want to say that I have investigated the matter and I find that I was in order, and that I was not accorded the right to which a Senator is entitled.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am curious to know how we are to proceed here. We have had two, three, or four statements about the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury and about the estimates of the Finance Committee and about what the revenue is to be and from what sources it is to be collected.

We are told this morning that the situation has changed since day before yesterday or three days ago or three weeks ago, and we do not know where we are. We do not know whether we are to get revenue enough now from the bill as it is, or whether we will have to adopt a sales tax, or whether we will have to add a tax on moving-picture performances, or what.

Are we to sit here all summer and rewrite this bill from day to day or are we to get somewhere and do something about it? The charge is that the Senate is delaying this matter. We have been told this morning that the Finance Committee is conferring with the Secretary of the Treasury. What have they been doing for four weeks back or four months back?

Of course, we want to get the bill in proper shape. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] yesterday endeavored to have a resolution adopted asking for a report from the Treasury as to the estimated revenue to be brought in, but somebody said that that was ridiculous, because we had all the information necessary, that we knew what we were going to get from this source and that source, and that there was no need of the resolution at all asking for any more information from the Secretary of the Treasury.

We are told this morning that the Finance Committee has been in very serious conference with the Secretary for some hour or two, and the whole situation has changed overnight. We do not know where we are. We do not know where we are going to get the money or from what sources.

I can not understand this thing at all. It seems to me that we ought to have definite information which would enable us to act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator's criticism, if he will permit me, is hardly justified, because we have news this morning that comes a great distance, which we could not have gotten before. I think the final word as given to us by the Senator from Pennsylvania that the sales tax to be offered would be satisfactory to the balance of the world, to foreign nations, is the last word. They are a good ways from us, and they could not get that word to us before. The Senator ought to realize that probably this is the last halt that will be necessary, because now we are informed that the sales tax would be satisfactory to Europe. That is the last word, and I do not suppose there will be anything further to come.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can realize, Mr. President, that there is something in what the Senator says; at the same time, we know, as a matter of history, that the bankrupt countries of Europe have resorted to the sales tax for some years. That is quite a common tax over there. When they go broke or can not finance themselves in any other way, they adopt the sales tax, and that has been in effect for some time. We knew that before.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. They had the sales tax before they went broke.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If this philosophy of taxation which now seems to be prevailing in the Senate, and has been all winter—leaving out of the picture the things which have brought this depression on and are making it worse every day—is to be followed further, it will be necessary, if we are to balance the Budget at all, to provide schedules which will automatically and progressively rise every 30 days to meet the new deficit that will manifest itself at the end of every 30 days.

Mr. NORRIS. Not every 30 days but every week.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It must be evident that, with incomes of the great masses of the people constantly diminishing, we can not balance the Budget through taxation any more than we can take water out of a well that is running dry.

It should be apparent that the paramount question before us is the changes necessary in Government policy to stop the destructive descending price level, restore purchasing power, and consequently the Budget will balance automatically.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suppose we will go on with some other details of the bill now. We have about finished all we attempted to provide for, and now we have voted in the Connally amendment and provided for this extra tax, and we are informed that perhaps that will not be enough to balance the Budget.

I do not know where we are to stop. I presume there are some details in connection with the bill we can go on with. I would like to go on and finish the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think we need be surprised that the able Secretary of the Treasury has at last openly advocated a sales tax. It was perfectly clear to me, from reading the report of the hearings before the Finance Committee, beginning weeks ago, that the Secretary was an advocate of the sales tax. The only reason why he did not recommend it in the beginning was, as I understood, that he did not think it was practical, that he could not at that time secure its adoption. Of course, I am not using his exact language; I am using what I understand clearly to be the legitimate deduction from what he did say. The Secretary has at all times, in my judgment, been an advocate of the sales tax. His theory of taxation would naturally lead him to the sales tax.

From the time the Mellon dynasty, which is being continued in the present Secretary, took charge of the finances of this country, until the present time, the fundamental principle upon which they have based their system of taxation has been to lower the taxes on the wealthier people, on the greater incomes, and place them gradually but more distinctly upon the average person or what we might call the common people. They were early after the war for cutting the higher brackets, they were for repealing the excess-profits tax, they were for everything which took the burden of the load from those most able to pay and were disposed to place it upon those least able to pay. This bill as recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury is full of proof of this policy.

They have finally reached the culmination of their doctrine. They have finally reached the sales tax, which would be laid in violation of the most fundamental principle of taxation, that is, according to ability to pay. The sales tax, if laid, is laid not according to ability to pay, but it is exacted regardless of the ability to pay of those who are taxed. The sales tax had its origin in this country in an effort to relieve the higher incomes.

There need be no surprise at this situation. It is the logical conclusion from the tax system which was inaugurated at the close of the war and has been carried on with remorseless purpose ever since.

It is my view, Mr. President, that the laying of a sales tax would further aggravate and accentuate the conditions now prevailing in this country. This tax would be passed fully and completely to the consuming public. The moment we could lay a sales tax we would serve notice on at least 70,000,000 of the people of the United States to curtail their purchases. They would be warned that they must do with less of the things they really need or at least desire.

It will do little good in rescuing the country from the present situation, to increase the purchasing power of the few. Before we start back on the road to prosperity we must increase the purchasing power of the masses, the millions. We must augment their purchasing power before it will have its effect upon our present situation.

The moment we lay a sales tax, that moment we would press down more heavily upon the millions of people who are now living close to the border line of denial of things they need, and notify them that if they were to get through the year, they must curtail and cut expenses still further. Instead of aiding in the present situation, instead of starting upon the road to recovery, we would be laying a tax which would sterilize the very activities which are necessary in order that we may recover.

While I do not propose at this time to enter upon a discussion, I want to say now as emphatically as I can that no arguments which the Secretary can produce, no condition which he can paint, no situation which his language could portray would induce me for a moment to consider favorably the sales tax. It is unjust. It is economically unsound. It will retard the restoration of the purchasing power of the masses. And it is not necessary in order to balance the Budget. We can do that with other taxes. And, furthermore, it will undermine still further the basis upon which prosperity must be rebuilt.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, some of us for the last two weeks have tried repeatedly to point out that we were not coming within a thousand miles of balancing the Budget upon any of the various propositions presented here. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] a moment ago wanted to know what we had been doing for the past two or three weeks. He manifests a lack of discernment that is not accustomed to him. What we have been doing was to receive messages from the White House insisting upon our balancing the Budget, and what has happened further is that extra constitutional messages have been presented to the public through the newspapers insisting upon balancing the Budget and reducing expenses.

Reduce expenses? Every time the Appropriations Committee has gone into session it has been confronted with Cabinet ministers protesting against doing the very thing that the White House has advised us to do. When we recommitted the Post Office and Treasury Departments appropriation bill the first thing that happened was that we were confronted by the Cabinet ministers heading those departments with the statement that if we should undertake to reduce their expenditures by the modest sum of 10 per cent they would be compelled to discharge approximately 50,000 employees.

One of those Cabinet officers went to the trouble to classify the number of employees that he would be compelled to discharge under this "brutal" resolution of the Senate, as he characterized it, carrying anxiety and consternation throughout the country in the breasts and minds of nearly 50,000 postal employees. He stated that he would be compelled to discharge so many rural route carriers, that he would be compelled to discharge so many city carriers, so many railway mail clerks, leaving the impression upon these people, for the purpose of protesting to Congress and propagandizing Members of the Senate, that the Senate had directed their discharge, not telling them that any man of ordinary common sense would rather have his wages cut 10 per cent than to lose his job altogether.

So with the Secretary of the Treasury. He pronounced the recommittal of the bill by the Senate as "a brutal species of government," and said that he would have to discharge 6,000 employees of the Treasury Department if we reduced the expenditures of the Government in that particular department by 10 per cent.

Yet it was revealed that in one of those departments contract after contract was made contrary to public policy, if not scandalous in its very nature. We are not going to balance the Budget until we reduce the expenditures of the United States Government. Here in a time of profound peace, when there is scarcely a nation on the civilized globe that has money enough to buy ammunition for a war, we are fast approaching an appropriation of $1,000,000,000 for war purposes alone.

We are not going to balance the Budget by any revenue measure we present here unless we cut severely the expenses of the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to make an announcement. The Chair has been requested to announce to the Senate that the President of the United States will deliver a message in person to the Senate at 12 o'clock. The Chair appoints the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to meet the President when he arrives at the Capitol.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 257, between lines 11 and 12, insert the following new section:

SEC. —. There is hereby imposed upon energy sold by privately owned, operating electrical-power companies a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the price for which so sold, payable from net income but not otherwise.

On page 262, line 6, after "article," insert "(other than electrical energy)."

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is imperative the Senate should consider sources from which money can be raised by the Treasury in the light of ability to pay. The power companies of the country can pay. They were 2.7 per cent more prosperous in 1930 than they were in 1929. They were 1.5 per cent more prosperous in 1931 than they were in 1929. Here is a source of revenue which can be tapped without causing distress.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the Senator brought his amendment to the attention of the Finance Committee?

Mr. HOWELL. I did.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am aware that the Senator spoke on the amendment yesterday.

Mr. HOWELL. I submitted the amendment to the Finance Committee at the time they were considering the tax bill, but no action was taken upon it.

I invite attention to the fact, furthermore, that I was told that one of the representatives of the Treasury opposed it because it was upon gross income. A sales tax is nothing but a tax on gross income. I am wondering if it were because of the power and wealth of this industry that representatives of the Treasury Department thought the equivalent of a sales tax ought not to be levied upon this industry.

Mr. President, the rates of the power industry are fixed through the operation of law. They have remained largely constant over the last 10 years, and during that period the cost of generation and distribution has decreased 44 per cent. Now the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to levy $150,000,000 upon gasoline in addition to the amount the States are levying upon gasoline. That is nothing but a sales tax. It is a sales tax imposed where gasoline already is carrying as much as it ought to carry in the various States. Why should we not seriously consider taxing an industry that has not felt the depression, that has thrived during the depression, rather than raise incomes taxes—yes; double taxes on incomes of individuals of $4,000, double a rate proposed by the House? Are we afraid to tax the great power industry?

Mr. President, this is a proper and a just tax. Taxes ought not to be imposed where they can not be borne without additional suffering. A great industry like this that can afford to respond in taxes should not be excluded from contributing its just share. Any industry in the country that has not felt the pinch of the depression should respond in a larger degree than other industries which are feeling the depression.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is the Senator prepared to say at the present time what the tax would be per kilowatt-hour?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes. For instance, when the amendment was proposed in the House providing for the taxing of the power companies or the product of the power companies it was proposed in the form of one-fourth of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour. As the Senator is aware, there are certain industries which obtain their electrical energy at a very low rate below the peak rate, industries which use this energy largely during the daytime, and in many cases they are afforded a rate as low as one-half cent per kilowatt-hour. Add one-fourth to the one-half now charged and that makes an increase in power costs to the manufacturing industry of 50 per cent. Of course, there was a protest. But what is it that I propose? Three per cent on gross income! What would that mean in the case of a rate of one-half cent per kilowatt-hour? It would mean an increase of fifteen-thousandths of a cent. If the rate was 1 cent, it would mean an increase of three-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Mr. PITTMAN. For instance, take the power that has been contracted for at approximately 2 mills per kilowatt-hour. This tax would increase it, we will say, about six-hundredths of a mill.

Mr. HOWELL. That is right; and it is a negligible tax.

Mr. President, in view of these facts, why should we not adopt an amendment of this character in order to balance the Budget? It will prevent the levying upon some sources of revenue that can far less stand the strain. It is a just tax. It is fair. It is against an industry that can bear it, an industry that is making tremendous profits year after year.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Taxing it would not reduce the charges?

Mr. HOWELL. The industry will not reduce its charges. In other lines prices have fallen. Farm prices have fallen and are still falling. They have fallen every month, almost every day, but the charges for electricity are practically constant. Electricity is a necessity now, and that is the reason why the income of these companies has not fallen.

Mr. PITTMAN. Can the Senator state approximately how much revenue the proposed tax would raise?

Mr. HOWELL. In 1929 the gross income of the operating power companies of the country, as reported by the National Electric Light Association—and I obtained the figures from the Commerce Department—was $1,928,000,000. Three per cent of that would approximate $60,000,000. My estimate is that the amendment would produce more than $50,000,000.

CAUSES OF THE DEPRESSION

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a résumé of a lecture at Oxford University by Prof. Gustav Cassel, of Paris, on the causes of the depression. In order that the Senate may be informed of just what my purpose is in requesting the publication of this résumé I desire to read one paragraph:

During the present crisis private enterprise has displayed a wonderful strength, in spite of all the extraordinary disturbances to which it has been exposed by arbitrary State interference. The capitalistic economy, however, necessarily presupposes a reasonable stability of the monetary system upon which it is built. To guarantee this stability is the only essential function of the State in the sphere of economic administration. Here the State has failed—

It is at this point that this eminent economist, who has no superior, so far as standing is concerned, either in Europe or in our land, puts his finger on the spot of our difficulties—

Here the state has failed. It was only when the monetary system broke down that the progress secured by private enterprise was interrupted and the world's economy became involved in the present crisis. It seems very strange that after such experience people still should see the salvation of humanity in an increase of governmental control of economic life.

When we are struggling with a crisis so great the matter of utmost importance is that there shall be no intellectual error in the diagnosis, and I submit the diagnosis of this eminent man for the consideration of the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the résumé will be printed in the RECORD.

The résumé is as follows:

[From the Manchester Guardian]

CAUSES OF THE CRISIS—PROFESSOR CASSEL'S RHODES LECTURE

Those who believe the world crisis is due to overproduction were given matter for reflection by Prof. Gustav Cassel, of Paris, in his second Rhodes lecture at Oxford. Professor Cassel declared that not overproduction but the fall in commodity prices due to financial causes was the central factor in the crisis.

"The postwar generation is no doubt guilty of a whole series of the most appalling faults, mistakes, and violations of fundamental economic principles, which together might well be expected to result in a crisis," he said. "Having finished the war, we have proceeded to claim war debts and reparations without being willing to accept payment, to cut up the world's market by aid of the most extraordinary protectionist devices into almost watertight compartments to prohibit the international migration of men, to hinder the free movement of capital, and to prevent by aid of great valorization schemes a national adjustment of the prices of certain commodities. Within our different countries we have developed monopolies both of enterprise and labor, and in this way have done all we could to restrict internal freedom of movement. Not content with that, we have created systems of unemployment doles calculated to increase the immobility of labor in a very dangerous way, and in addition to ruin public finances.

"Nobody could doubt that the most characteristic feature of the economic development since the middle of 1929 is the extraordinary fall in prices.

"Such a fall in commodity prices was a monetary phenomenon, and required an explanation of a monetary character. In spite of this character of the present crisis the most popular explanations were still those based on vague ideas of overproduction and overexpansion. It was, however, a mistake to believe that production in the years 1925–1929 showed an abnormal rate of progress. Investigations showed that the rate of progress in these years corresponded approximately to the average pre-war rate of 3 per cent per year. The whole idea that the rate of progress was exaggerated and that this exaggeration must necessarily be punished found no support in the actual facts.

"The idea that rapid progress is possible only for a limited period and necessarily must be followed by a period of restriction is based on the superstitious belief that the capacity for production develops faster than that for consumption, and that it is necessary therefore now and then to slow down production for some time in order to give consumption time to overtake production. This belief is based on a defective understanding of the actual mechanism of uniform economic progress. In the normal state of development consumption grows at the same pace as production, and the same is true with regard to saving and creation of fresh capital.

"During the present crisis private enterprise has displayed a wonderful strength, in spite of all the extraordinary disturbances to which it has been exposed by arbitrary state interference. The capitalistic economy, however, necessarily presupposes a reasonable stability of the monetary system upon which it is built. To guarantee this stability is the only essential function of the state in the sphere of economic administration. Here the state has failed. It was only when the monetary system broke down that the progress secured by private enterprise was interrupted and the world's economy became involved in the present crisis. It seems very strange that after such experience people still should see the salvation of humanity in an increase of governmental control of economic life."

NEW ENGLAND'S ATTITUDE TOWARD SALES TAX

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a story printed in the Boston Transcript May 25, 1932, showing that manufacturers, by a ratio of 11 to 1 in Massachusetts and 9 to 1 in New England, have indorsed a manufacturers' sales tax.

The manufacturers have sent telegrams of the same purport to both the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and myself. The public in general, including the wage earners in Massachusetts and throughout New England, are in favor of the sales tax.

I believe that the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], which provides for a manufacturers' tax which exempts articles of food, clothing, medicines, and other items, will be acceptable to the great mass of people and will accomplish the end which we are all seeking, the balancing of the Budget, so that confidence will be restored to the country.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Transcript, May 25, 1932]

MANUFACTURERS STAND 9 TO 1 FOR SALES TAX—POLL BY NEW ENGLAND COUNCIL SHOWS OVERWHELMING SENTIMENT FOR PROPOSAL—MASSACHUSETTS VOTES 11 TO 1 IN FAVOR—SENATOR WALSH ADVISED RETURNS ARE "INCOMPLETE BUT QUITE CONCLUSIVE"

New England manufacturers, responding to date to the New England Council's poll stand 9 to 1 in favor of the manufacturers' sales tax as a measure toward balancing the Federal Budget, the council announced to-day.

In a telegram to Senator DAVID I. WALSH, who last night advanced a sales-tax proposal in the Senate, the council informed him of the "incomplete but quite conclusive" returns up to noon to-day in its New England-wide canvass. The announcement emphasizes the fact that the council itself is taking no position on the question, but is conducting a poll among New England manufacturers solely to establish the facts as to their attitude.

The 674 votes received up to noon to-day showed, in addition to the 9-to-1 preponderance in favor of the manufacturers' sales tax on the part of New England manufacturers, the following ratios by States: Massachusetts, 11 to 1 in favor; Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, 9 to 1 in favor; Connecticut, 6 to 1 in favor; Vermont, 5 to 1 in favor.

The council's telegram to Senator WALSH, signed by Dudley Harmon, executive secretary, follows:

"Returns to date in New England council canvass of representative New England industries seem to furnish adequate warrant for statement that they favor low rate general manufacturers' sales tax as means of balancing Federal Budget. Acting neither as an advocate nor as an opponent of the measure, but only in order to determine quickly the actual views of New England industries, on Saturday night last we mailed postcards to our standard list of 2,175 manufacturers long ago selected as the most important industries in New England and carefully distributed as to locations and types of industries. Our inquiry asked them to reply 'yes' or 'no' by return postcard on this question: 'I favor the low-rate manufacturers' sales tax as originally proposed by the Ways and Means Committee of the United States House of Representatives.' Up to noon to-day 674 replies received. Six hundred and eight are checked 'yes' and 66 'no,' a ratio of 9 to 1 in favor for New England industry as a whole. By States the ratios in favor are Massachusetts, which has half of New England's industrial activity, 11 to 1; Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, 9 to 1; Connecticut, 6 to 1; and Vermont, 5 to 1. In addition we have to-day received letters from such important industrial associations as the Associated Industries of Massachusetts and the Manufacturers' Association of Connecticut stating that their organizations strongly favor the general manufacturers sales tax. Local convasses made by chambers of commerce in Worcester, Lynn, and Milford show similar preponderance of local business opinion, manufacturers and others in favor. I shall advise you of final results of our canvass, but in view of your announcement in the Senate last evening we felt you should be advised promptly of the incomplete but quite conclusive returns to date."

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a short while ago I was speaking about the Philippine independence bill, and it is my desire now, if I may, to continue the discussion.

From my earliest boyhood I have been interested in the Philippines. It so happens that I was born in Michigan, in the county in which the University of Michigan is located. As early as 1874 one of the professors of the university, Prof. Joseph Beal Steere, started out on an expedition to explore the Philippines. He was there a considerable time, and, in spite of the difficulties of transportation, covered a large area of the islands; on horseback and in native boats he traversed the entire country. When the professor returned to civilization he brought back a remarkable collection of birds and animals which are now stored in the museum of the university and known as the Beal-Steere collection.

I recall that among the articles returned was a dugout, a canoe made from a log. It hung suspended in the museum, and I remember as a small boy that my father lifted me up into that canoe. Naturally it excited my curiosity, as my father told me the story of Professor Steere's expedition to the Philippines, that this canoe and the other relics, consisting of spears and axes and other implements of war and peace, had been brought back by Professor Steere and placed in the university.

Then, when I was a student in the university, Professor Steere decided to take another trip to the Philippines. That was in 1887 or 1888. He took with him two of my classmates, Dean Worcester and Frank S. Bourns, afterwards Doctor Bourns, and another student whom I did not know, Mr. E. L. Mosley. So the second expedition to the Philippines was another University of Michigan expedition. In due time these men came back and, of course, told their classmates and friends about the wonders of that country.

They arrived in Manila in September, 1887, and during the next 11 months visited practically all the islands of the group, or at least the chief islands. They were looked upon with suspicion by the Spanish authorities, but escaped any trouble beyond suffering in health from the natural results of exposure to hardship, the climate, and so forth.

In 1890 Worcester and Bourns returned to the Philippines. They were well received this time by the authorities, even by General Weyler, the governor general. These old friends of mine divided their time between association with the high Spanish officials and the wildest savages.

After the Spanish War the University of Michigan had a large part in the reconstruction activities in the Philippines. I remember being in Washington on a visit at that time and was in the office of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Mr. Charles C. Moore, now an honored citizen of this city and head of the National Park and Planning Commission, was secretary to Senator McMillan, of Michigan, who was chairman of the District of Columbia Committee. While I was talking with Mr. Moore Senator McMillan came in and said to Moore, "Who is Dean Worcester?" Mr. Moore replied, "He is a graduate of the University of Michigan; has made two trips to the Philippines. He has just brought out a 2-volume book on the Philippines." As a matter of fact, the material contained in Dean Worcester's book was all we knew in the United States about the Philippine Islands.

After we took the Philippines Dean Worcester was appointed, with President Schurman and General Otis and Admiral Dewey and Colonel Denby, as commissioner of the Philippine Islands. Worcester served on the second commission with Taft and Luke Wright and Henry C. Ide and Bernard Moses. In 1901, when Mr. Taft was made civil governor of the Philippines, Worcester was made Secretary of the Interior.

Then, as civilization proceeded in the Philippine Islands courts were established, and once more—and, if I may, I say it with some pride, Mr. President—my own university furnished Judge Johnson and Judge Smith and Judge Malcolm, Johnson and Malcolm still serving in the courts of the Philippines. And with the establishment of a university in the Philippines, Prof. Paul C. Freer, an old friend of mine from the university, was loaned to the Philippines and became dean of the scientific school. So you will see, Mr.

President, for personal reasons I have had always an interest in the Philippine Islands.

Almost the first public speeches I ever made—I did not realize then that I would be filling in time for the Finance Committee of the United States Senate while waiting for them to return with their report and for the visit of the President—related to the freedom of Cuba. I went around the country agitating intervention in Cuba in order that the suffering people there might be released from the tyranny of oppression.

Now we have before us a problem growing out of the Spanish War, the Philippine problem. We have pending here measures which have to do with their release from our sovereignty. Within a short time the Senate must decide what action it will take with reference to those measures.

In a way, Mr. President, I am sorry that I have given the matter any study. It is almost cruel for me to impose my views upon the Senate, because I assure Senators that if they will study this question in a broad, open-minded way, each of them, I think, will reach the same conclusion I have reached, that there is no authority under the Constitution for us to alienate sovereignty over the Philippine Islands. These islands have become fused in the common territory of our country; they belong to the people of the United States. We have no more right to alienate sovereignty over them than we have to alienate sovereignty over Colorado or Texas or California or my own State of New York. These islands are the property of the people of our country, and only by the mandate of the people can they be given sovereignty or our ownership released in any other manner.

In my opinion, Mr. President, it requires an amendment to the Constitution to divest ourselves of the responsibility and ownership of the Philippine Islands.

When I say this, I know there are many upon the floor, undoubtedly the large majority of the Senate, who take the opposite view. But I am here to say that except in the establishment of boundaries where we thought we had sovereignty, the American flag has never been taken down from over any land on the face of the earth. Where the American flag has once flown it was destined from the beginning to stay forever, unless the people, exercising their sovereign right, should determine that by an amendment to the Constitution the Congress might alienate territory or sovereignty.

I had a colloquy with the eminent Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], than whom there is no greater authority on law, in my opinion, in the Congress of the United States. In a colloquy with him he called attention to a part of Samoa, and said that there was an instance where sovereignty had been released. I had no effective reply at the time, because I was not fully informed then. I am now. We never gave up in Samoa one single island that was ever ours by any right of agreement or treaty.

The Samoan Islands, Mr. President—at least, such parts of them as we are interested in—lie between longitude 171 and 170 west of Greenwich. There are other islands in this group which lie west of the one hundred and seventy-first degree of longitude. At one time these islands were divided in their control between the countries of Great Britain, Germany, and the United States. Our interest in the Samoan Islands is founded on a treaty of commerce concluded on January 17, 1878, ratified by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and proclaimed on February 13, 1878.

I want to call attention to what is dealt with in that treaty.

This is a treaty which relates wholly to Tutuila, and our reason for desiring it was that we could have a naval station at Pago-Pago. This, perhaps, is not the occasion to enlarge upon the particular treaty, but one interested may find it on page 1574 of volume 2 of the Treaties, Conventions, International Acts, Protocols, and Agreements between the United States of America and Other Powers, a Government document—Document No. 357 of the Sixty-first Congress, second session. It is by this treaty only that we have any rights whatever in Samoa.

When my attention was called by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to what had happened in Samoa, what he said seemed to be an effective reply to my statement that the United States has never hauled down its flag; but let me refer to the convention with regard to the Samoan Islands held in Washington in 1899. The convention was concluded on December 2. The Senate was advised, the treaty was ratified, and proclaimed on February 16, 1900.

By this treaty Great Britain renounced all interest in the Samoan Islands, and Germany and Great Britain both renounced in favor of the United States all rights and claims over and in respect to the island of Tutuila and all other islands in the Samoan group east of longitude 171 west of Greenwich. Then, reciprocally, the United States of America renounced in favor of Germany all our rights and claims over and in respect to the islands of the Samoan group west of longitude 171 west of Greenwich. That would seem to mean that we had actually given away territory; but, as a matter of fact, we never owned an inch of land west of 171. We had no claim whatever to any territory over there; and our act was exactly like mine would be if I deeded the property that the Capitol stands on, having no right or title whatever to it.

So, Mr. President, that is the only instance that has been raised in my hearing that indicated that the United States had pulled down its flag. My statement stands that we never have lowered our flag over one bit of territory that rightfully belonged to us; and, in my opinion, we have no constitutional right to do it.

On another occasion I shall attempt to amplify my views regarding the Philippines and their independence.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I desire to make just a few comments with respect to the speech made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] yesterday, and to say that though I am of foreign birth I have no desire to nor have I at any time sold America short. But, Mr. President, it seems that some of our colleagues and some others are willing to sell America short for the sake of putting over their own program.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make the point of no quorum?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hebert	Patterson

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, before the quorum was called, I asked the opportunity of saying a few words concerning the statements of the Senator from Pennsylvania made on the floor of the Senate yesterday with respect to the withdrawal of gold from this country and with respect to the terrible prospects. While I am of foreign birth, I have never engaged in selling America short. Nor would

I adopt any plan or policy to help to frighten the people of my adopted country. The kind of misinformation the Senator from Pennsylvania gave to the public yesterday is most alarming and unwarranted.

I am not charging the Senator from Pennsylvania with making any misstatements with knowledge, but I want to point out that the statements he made last evening were not true in fact, that the conditions are not such as he describes, and that the conditions with respect to gold withdrawals are not going on to the extent which he elaborated.

Not only that, the conditions are not as terrifically bad as they are described by some of the propagandists for the adoption of the so-called sales tax.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is quoted in the RECORD as saying last evening, among other things:

We are going to face the facts when we consider this bill the remainder of the time it is under consideration. We are going to face the facts and realize that as Americans it is our duty to balance the Budget and show the world that America is sound. We know it is sound, but the world has begun to distrust it.

Mr. President, I do not know any group of American citizens who distrust America, unless it is the creditor class. This whole campaign is directed for the benefit of the creditor class, entirely ignoring the pitiable condition of the debtor class. This whole agitation to maintain the gold standard and to balance the Budget is just a part of the propaganda for the purpose of extracting from the debtor class the last ounce of ability to pay.

As I said this morning, gold is being drained out of the United States as fast as the steamers can take it. The amount that can be carried upon any one steamer is limited by the amount of insurance the underwriters will give on a single shipment in one vessel, and, thank Heaven, the number of vessels going is comparatively limited.

Think, Mr. President, that the Senator is calling to Heaven to maintain the creditor class, notwithstanding what the debtor class may have to go through to supply the needs. I quote further:

We lost about $100,000,000 in the six business days of last week. We lost half that much the week before.

He again calls upon Heaven:

Heaven only knows what we will lose this week. But the limit is the capacity of the steamers themselves, and the amount of insurance that can be obtained upon them.

Mr. President, in last night's Washington Star there was a dispatch from New York, and I desire to quote from it, at least in part:

NEW YORK, May 30.—Although New York banks and exchanges were closed to-day in commemoration of Memorial Day, many bankers and brokers kept in constant touch with Washington to learn the outcome of the tax discussions there, because of their possible effect on the current drain of gold from the United States and the fall of the dollar over the week-end. Should the tax discussions lead to a quick balancing of the Budget, they would at the same time put an end to the gold efflux.

That is the very thing those who have gone through this bill up to date want to do, immediately to balance the Budget. It could have been balanced either Saturday night or last night. I continue to quote:

A net loss of $90,757,900 of gold, the largest since last October—

Remember, that is just since last October. Last October it was more than it is now—

A net loss of $90,757,900 of gold, the largest since last October, has featured a series of unpleasant financial events, including a severe decline in bonds, in the New York market in the past week. This latest movement has brought the total of efflux to $284,835,000 since the metal movement was resumed on April 13. As a result of these exports American gold monetary stocks now total $4,207,000,000, a loss of 12 per cent since this time last year.

In spite of all the great depression, it has dropped off only 12 per cent in a year:

This gold flow coincides with fresh foreign fears for the stability of the dollar. These fears have been fanned again by congressional talk of "inflation," which is like deadly poison to Europe. Such "inflation fears" were spurred by the passage by the House of the Goldsborough bill, discussions of a soldiers' bonus to be paid in newly issued currency, and proposals of a huge Government bond issue for unemployment relief. The foreigners' fears also have been aggravated by the congressional failure thus far to balance the Budget.

A study of the weekly Federal reserve system statements during March, or shortly after the passage of the Glass-Steagall bill and the system's inauguration of its Government security buying program, reveals a slight increase—in gold stocks. Discussions about the Goldsborough bill, which was passed by the House May 2 and which the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency is considering this week, engendered inflationary fears, so foreigners renewed their gold withdrawals.

A slight increase—

NOTE CIRCULATION FIGURES

The manner in which the Glass-Steagall bill is operating is indicated by the reserve system's statements on March 23 and May 26. On the former date Federal reserve note circulation totaled $2,822,755,000. It was secured by 75.6 per cent gold and 24.4 per cent commercial paper.

Where is the hazard to our country, when 75 to 76 per cent of all our issue is secured by gold?

On the latter date—

That is, May 26—

on the latter date reserve-note circulation totaled $2,758,223,000. It was secured by 76 per cent gold, 17 per cent commercial paper, and 7 per cent by United States Government securities.

Since early discussions of the Goldsborough bill began, or between April 13 and the present, $284,835,000 of gold has been exported, despite betterments in other directions, brought about by the Glass-Steagall Act.

Mr. President, I do not intend to finish reading this article, but I ask to have the whole article printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, there is absolutely no justification, there is no warrant, for this scattering fear throughout the Nation about the country going off the gold standard, with such a standing as now exists in the Federal reserve. But whether we do or not, just why is it so critical, especially to the debtor class? Just why have we to make all of the sacrifices to maintain the gold standard and to balance the Budget, all in the interest of the creditor class?

I am not able to revert to the remarks made by the Senator from Illinois last night with respect to patriotism; but I want to say that all of the patriotism in the United States does not belong to the creditor group. There are a great many millions of our people who are heavily in debt, who are under heavy obligations, who have no sources of income, who should be protected and cared for, even though we have to make some sacrifice in our legislation against the interests of the creditor class.

(The article from the Washington Star of May 30 is as follows:)

BROKERS WORRIED BY GOLD OUTFLOW—WALL STREET TRADERS KEEP IN CLOSE TOUCH WITH TAX DISCUSSIONS

NEW YORK, May 30.—Although New York banks and exchanges were closed to-day in commemoration of Memorial Day, many bankers and brokers kept in constant touch with Washington to learn the outcome of the tax discussions there because of their possible effect on the current drain of gold from the United States and the fall of the dollar over the week-end. INFLATION TALK FANS FEARS

This gold flow coincides with fresh foreign fears for the stability of the dollar. These fears have been fanned again by congressional talk of "inflation," which is like deadly poison to Europe. Such "inflation fears" were spurred by the passage by the House of the Goldsborough bill, discussions of a soldiers' bonus to be paid in newly issued currency, and proposals of a huge Government bond issue for unemployment relief. The foreigners' fears also have been aggravated by the congressional failure thus far to balance the Budget.

A study of the weekly Federal reserve-system statements during March, or shortly after the passage of the Glass-Steagall bill and the system's inauguration of its Government security-buying program, reveals a slight increase in gold stocks. Discussions about the Goldsborough bill, which was passed by the House May 2 and which the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency is considering this week, engendered inflationary fears, so foreigners renewed their gold withdrawals.

NOTE-CIRCULATION FIGURES

The manner in which the Glass-Steagall bill is operating is indicated by the reserve system's statements on March 23 and May 26. On the former date Federal reserve note circulation totaled $2,822,755,000. It was secured by 75.6 per cent gold and 24.4 per cent commercial paper. Wall Street believes that the quicker the Budget is balanced by the passage of a sales tax or otherwise and Congress adjourns the better off this country will be, because the foreigners' fears of inflation will be allayed and the gold-export movement will naturally subside.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan began his remarks by stating that unintentionally I had said a lot of things last night that were not true. The Senator then very kindly read an article from last night's paper which confirmed everything I had said. Consequently I do not need to answer.

When the Senator says that the agitation in favor of balancing the Budget and the agitation and anxiety that this country should remain on the gold standard are due to propaganda in favor of the creditor class, he betrays a state of mind which I am afraid is past cure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have about eight or nine perfecting amendments to offer.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does not the Senator think we ought to wait until the President makes his address to the Senate before we go further in the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as the President arrives we can desist from the consideration of the amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by my colleague is now pending.

Mr. SMOOT. These are just perfecting amendments, and I thought I could offer them without displacing the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska. I send to the desk the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment would not be in order at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may offer the amendments.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the amendment now pending I withdrew yesterday upon request. I do not feel that I can withdraw it again.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us vote on it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator objects, then?

Mr. HOWELL. I object to withdrawing my amendment to allow the Senator's amendment to be considered.

Mr. SMOOT. My amendment would not have to be discussed. If it led to any discussion, I would withdraw it immediately. I did not want to displace the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. If it leads to no discussion, I will have no objection to temporarily laying aside my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I am sure it would lead to no discussion.

Mr. HOWELL. But I would want to proceed with my amendment immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of the amendments the Senator refers to.

Mr. SMOOT. It is 12 o'clock now, and I shall not ask the Senator to withdraw his amendment.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT (S. DOC. NO. 97)

The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the President of the United States was escorted into the Chamber by Mr. WATSON and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and, having been presented to the Senate by the Vice President, delivered from the Secretary's desk the following address:

Mr. Vice President and Senators:

An emergency has developed in the last few days which it is my duty to lay before the Senate.

The continued downward movement in the economic life of the country has been particularly accelerated during the past few days, and it relates in part definitely to the financial program of the Government. There can be no doubt that superimposed upon other causes the long-continued delays in the passage of legislation providing for such reduction in expenses and such addition to revenues as would balance the Budget, together with proposals of projects which would greatly increase governmental expenditures, have given rise to doubt and anxiety as to the ability of our Government to meet its responsibilities. These fears and doubts have been foolishly exaggerated in foreign countries. They know from bitter experience that the course of unbalanced budgets is the road to ruin. They do not realize that slow as our processes may be we are determined and have the resources to place the finances of the United States on an unassailable basis.

The immediate result has been to create an entirely unjustified run upon the American dollar from foreign countries, and within the past few days, despite our national wealth and resources and our unparalleled gold reserves, our dollar stands at a serious discount in the markets of the world for the first time in half a century. This can be and must be immediately corrected or the reaction upon our economic situation will be such as to cause great losses to our people and will still further retard recovery. Nor is the confusion in public mind and the rising feeling of doubt and fear confined to foreign countries. They are reflected directly in diminished economic activity and increased unemployment within our own borders and among our own citizens. There is thus further stress upon already diminished and strained economic life of the country.

No one has a more sympathetic realization than I of the difficulties and complexities of the problem with which the Congress is confronted. The decrease in revenues due to the depression by upward of $1,700,000,000 and the consequent necessity to reduce governmental expenditures, the sacrifice such reduction calls for from many groups and sections, the further sacrifice called for in the distribution of the remaining burden by the imposition of new taxes, all constitute a problem which naturally arouses wide divergence of sectional interest and individual views. Yet if we are to secure a just distribution of these sacrifices in such fashion as to establish confidence in the integrity of the Government, we must secure an adjustment of these views to quick and prompt national action, directed at one sole purpose; that is, to unfetter the rehabilitation of industry, agriculture, and unemployment. The time has come when we must all make sacrifice of some parts of our particular views and bring these dangers and degenerations to halt by expeditious action.

In the stress of this emergency I have conferred with members of both parties of the Senate as to methods by which the strains and stresses could be overcome and the gigantic resources and energies of our people released from the fetters in which they are held. I have felt in the stress of this emergency a grave responsibility rests upon me not only to present the situation to the Senate but to make suggestions as to the basis of adjustment between these views which I hope will lead to early action. And I am addressing myself to the Senate on this occasion as the major questions under consideration are now before this body.

We have three major duties in legislation in order to accomplish our fundamental purposes.

First. Drastic reduction of expenditures.

Second. Passage of adequate revenue legislation, the combination of which with reductions will unquestionably beyond all manner of doubt declare to the world the balancing of the Federal Budget and the stabilizing of the American dollar.

Third. Passage of adequate relief legislation to assure the country against distress and to aid in employment pending the next session of Congress.

It is essential that when we ask our citizens to undertake the burdens of increased taxation we must give to them evidence of reduction of every expenditure not absolutely vital to the immediate conduct of the Government. The Executive Budget of last December provided for a reduction of expenditures in the next fiscal year over the then estimated expenditures of the current year by about $370,000,000. I have recommended to the Congress from time to time the necessity for passage of legislation which would give authority for further important reductions in expenditures not possible for consideration by either the Executive or the committees of Congress without such legislation.

An earnest nonpartisan effort was made to secure these purposes in a national economy bill in the House, but it largely failed. That subject is under review by the bipartisan committee appointed from the members of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and I am informed it has tentatively agreed upon a recommendation which would aggregate savings of $250,000,000, together with a number of undetermined further possibilities. I am not informed as to details of these recommendations, although I learn that my own suggestions in many instances have not been accepted. But I do know that the committee has made honest and earnest effort to reach a just reduction in expenditures, and I trust therefore that despite any of our individual views or the sacrifice of any group that we can unite in support and expeditious adoption of the committee's conclusions. In addition to the economies which may be brought about through the economy bill, the direct reductions of the Appropriations Committees should increase this figure to at least $400,000,000, not including certain postponements to later deficiency bills. As this sum forms the basis of calculations as to increased taxes necessary, it is essential that no matter what the details may be, that amount of reduction must be obtained or taxes must be increased to compensate. If this minimum of $400,000,000 is attained by congressional action, together with the $369,000,000 effected through Executive Budget, except for amounts already budgeted for public works in aid to unemployment and increased costs of veterans, we will have reduced expenditures of this Government to the lowest point since 1916.

In the matter of tax legislation we must face the plain and unpalatable fact that due to the degeneration in the economic situation during the past month the estimates of fertility of taxes which have been made from time to time based upon the then current prospects of business must be readjusted to take account of the decreasing business activity and shrinking values. The Finance Committee has been advised that the setbacks of the past month now make it evident that if we are to have absolute assurance of the needed income with breadth of base which would make a certainty of the collections, we must face additional taxes to those now proposed by the Senate Finance Committee.

I recognize the complaint that estimates of the taxes required and reductions of expenses needed have been repeatedly increased; but, on the other hand, it should be borne in mind that if tax and economy legislation recommended from time to time since last December had been promptly enacted there would have been less degeneration and stagnation in the country. But it is unprofitable to argue any such questions. We must face the situation as it exists to-day.

In the course of the six months during which the revenue bill has been considered in the House and Senate, practically every form of tax has been suggested at one time or another. Many have found their way into the bill later to be rejected. The total amount Congress originally set out to obtain has been gradually whittled down, either by actual reductions or degeneration of the situation, while needs have increased.

If we examine the major sources of possible increases in taxes now proposed and the nature of taxes already voted, it may well be that the income taxes have already been raised to the point of diminishing returns through avoidance which will ensue by the use of tax-exempt securities and are already so high as to approach the danger point in retardation of enterprise. It is advisable that more relief should be given to earned incomes. Nor will further increase in income tax, even including the proposals of Senator CONNALLY, cover the gap in our revenues or provide against any failure to reduce expenses to the full amount I have stated. The Senate has already imposed a multitude of specific manufacturers' excise taxes on special industries. Some of them appear discriminatory and uncertain in their productivity. I have not and do not favor a general sales tax. It has not been proposed by the Treasury. A sales tax is not, however, to be confused with an extension of the special manufacturers' excise taxes to a general manufacturers' excise tax with exemptions of food and clothing. This is an entirely different tax from a so-called sales tax and can not be pyramided. Even this general manufacturers' excise tax has not been proposed by the Treasury, although at the time such a tax was unanimously recommended by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, representing both political parties and their leaders in the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Treasury accepted it in the hope that immediate passage of the bill would result. In order, however, to solve our problem and give assurance to the country and the world of the impregnability of the American dollar and that we are ready to meet our emergencies at any sacrifice, I have now come to favor an extension, for a limited period, of the many special excise taxes to a more general manufacturers' excise tax and will support the Congress if it should be adopted. Whether this be the course or not, some further emergency-tax sources should be incorporated in the pending bill.

Our third problem is that of relief. The sharp degeneration has its many reflexes in distress and hardship upon our people. I hold that the maintenance of the sense of individual and personal responsibility of men to their neighbors and the proper separation of functions of the Federal and local Governments require the maintenance of the fundamental principle that the obligation of distress rests upon the individuals, upon the communities, and upon the States. In order, however, that there may be no failure on the part of any State to meet its obligation in this direction I have, after consultation with some of the party leaders on both sides, favored authorization to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan up to $300,000,000 to State governments where they are unable to finance themselves in provision of relief to distress. Such loans should be made by purchase of State bonds by the corporation; but where States are unable to issue bonds, then loans should be made upon application of State authorities; and if they are not regularized by the issuance of bonds within a period of 12 to 18 months, they should become a charge upon the Federal aid funds to which such States may be entitled.

In order to aid unemployment and to avoid wasteful expansion of public works, I have favored an authority to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to increase its issues of its securities to the maximum of $3,000,000,000 in order that it may extend its services both in aid to employment and agriculture on a wide scale. Under the methods proposed the corporation is to be (a) authorized to buy bonds from political subdivisions or public bodies to aid in construction of income-producing or self-liquidating projects; (b) to make loans to established enterprise upon adequate security for advancement of sound projects that will increase employment, but safeguarded by requirement that some portion of outside capital is also provided; (c) to divert a portion of the unexpended authorizations of agricultural loans through the Secretary of Agriculture to the finance exports of agricultural products; (d) to make loans to institutions upon security of agricultural commodities to assure the carrying of normal stocks of these commodities and thus by stabilizing their loan value to steady their price levels; (e) to make loans to the Federal Farm Board to enable extension of finance of farm cooperatives.

I have not been able to favor the expansion of public works beyond the program already proposed in the Budget. I have for many years advocated speeding up of public works as relief to unemployment in times of depression. Since the beginning of this depression, in consonance with this view, the Federal Government will have expended in excess of $1,500,000,000 in construction and maintenance of one kind or another as against a normal program of perhaps $650,000,000 for a similar period. The Budget for next year calls for over $550,000,000, or double our usual outlay. If we shall now increase these programs we shall need instantly to increase taxes still further. We have already forced every project which we have justification with any regard to the taxpayer and the avoidance of sheer waste. It is not my desire on this occasion to argue the comparative merits of extending such a program and that of financing an even larger program of employment on productive works through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. We are indeed all desirous of serving our fellow citizens who are in difficulty, and we must serve them in such a fashion that we do not increase the ranks of unemployed. I may emphasize that this alternative program avoids drain upon the taxpayer and above all, if we are to balance our Budget and balance it in such fashion that our people and the world may know it is balanced, we can not make further appropriations in any direction beyond the amounts now before the Congress.

I am confident that if the Congress could find in these suggestions which come from members of both parties a ground for adjustment of legislation on those dominant particulars and could bring it into immediate action, it would yield not only relief to the country but would reestablish that confidence which we so sorely need.

The natural wealth of this country is unimpaired, and the inherent abilities of our people to meet their problems are being restrained by failure of the Government to act. Time is of the essence. Every day's delay makes new wounds and extends them. I come before you in sympathy with the difficulties which the problem presents and in a sincere spirit of helpfulness. I ask of you to accept such a basis of practical adjustment essential to the welfare of our people. In your hands at this moment is the answer to the question whether democracy has the capacity to act speedily enough to save itself in emergency. The Nation urgently needs unity. It needs solidarity before the world in demonstrating that America has the courage to look its difficulties in the face and the capacity and resolution to meet them.

The President of the United States retired from the Chamber escorted by Mr. WATSON and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message will lie on the table and be printed.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he knows of any further discussion upon his amendment?

Mr. HOWELL. I think there will be some further discussion upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana was trying to secure recognition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senate will excuse the Committee on Finance, we have a number of matters to dispose of, and I ask the committee now to meet in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs for a continuance of the consideration of questions which we were discussing this morning.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it appears to be desirable, if not entirely necessary, that we impose upon the people of the country still further taxes in order to meet the necessary expenses of the Government. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] proposes to impose a tax of 3 per cent upon the gross income of companies engaged in the production of electrical energy. He has pointed out that this is an industry that has not only not suffered with other industries throughout the country by reason of the general depression, but that it has held its own and, in many instances, has shown a better return for 1931 than for 1930.

We have been obliged to impose heavy burdens, for instance, upon the automobile industry and upon various other lines of activity that can ill endure the added tax. Here is one industry that can stand it by reason of its relative prosperity. The tax proposed will not be burdensome and yet will produce a revenue of $50,000,000 to the Government.

That it can endure the tax, Mr. President, was clearly pointed out by the Senator from Nebraska, and I regret very much, indeed, that greater attention was not paid to his discussion of his amendment.

To indicate that he is entirely correct about the situation, so far as the income of these companies is concerned, I call attention to an advertisement which is found in the Review of Reviews for the month of June, which came to our desks a few days ago. It is an advertisement of the Associated Gas & Electric System, whose offices are at 61 Broadway, New York. I read as follows:

THREE REASONS FOR THE STABILITY OF UTILITY REVENUES

Electric and gas utilities enjoy unusual stability of revenues, because—

1. Electricity and gas are not subject to wide price fluctuations. While utilities do not make the profits a private business can earn in prosperous times, they do not suffer the same losses in poor times.

2. Electricity and gas are growing industries which supply a daily need in the home.

3. There is no problem of overproduction. Only as much gas and electricity is produced as is used.

Of the Associated System's 1,434,000 customers, 1,189,000 are residential electric and gas users. The average annual use of electricity by residential customers increased 8.3 per cent during 1931, and their use of gas maintained its previous level. This gain offset industrial losses to the extent that the system recorded a total increase of approximately 1 per cent in gross operating revenues for all departments.

For information about facilities, service, rates write Associated Gas & Electric System, 61 Broadway, New York.

The same company has an advertisement of much the same character in Time of April 18, 1932, as follows:

8.3 PER CENT MORE ELECTRICITY USED IN ASSOCIATED HOMES

An increase of 8.3 per cent in the average annual use of electricity was recorded during 1931 in the homes served by the Associated System. This gain resulted from—

1. Success of the system in distributing load-building appliances like ranges, refrigerators, water heaters. Estimated annual revenue from all new business activities during 1931 totals $5,839,000.

2. Acceptance by customers of inducement rates, which makes possible additional use of current at a low unit cost.

Over 20,000 new electric customers were put on associated lines during the year. The sound expansion of the system's domestic electric service provides an important and stable source of revenue for associated securities.

The Senator from Nebraska pointed out that this condition is not peculiar to any particular section of the country. He called attention to the advancing revenues of the local power and light companies as well as to the same condition in the company furnishing power and light for the city of Omaha.

I have before me here the weekly Moody's Public Utilities Reports, from which it will appear that the same condition prevails throughout the country. There has been a falling off in revenues of those companies which supply a large share of the energy for industrial uses; but in the case of practically all the companies whose activities are confined to domestic customers the returns for 1931 have exceeded those for 1930, and for reasons pointed out by the Senator from Nebraska—namely, their rates remain stable, their domestic customers demand practically the same amount, and their expenses have decreased with the fall of prices generally.

From this volume of Moody's, at page 948, we learn that the Buffalo, Niagara & Eastern Power Corporation had net earnings for 1930 of $16,409,588, and for 1931 had net earnings of $17,103,077—an increase in net revenues of something like $800,000.

At page 952 we learn that the Kansas Power & Light Co. had net revenues for 1930 of $1,143,243, and for 1931 of $1,175,402.

At page 953 we find the returns for the Michigan Electric Power Co., as follows:

For 1930	$177,826
For 1931	219,885

Let us go to quite the opposite section of the country—to New England.

At page 955 we have the returns for the New England Gas & Electric Association, consolidated earnings, 12 months to March 31, 1932. That brings us down very nearly to date. The returns for 1930 were $3,772,030, and for 1931, $3,824,175.

The Mountain States Power Co.—whose offices, as I recall, are at Denver—had, for 1930, net income of $371,841, and for 1931, $373,438.

At page 967 we have the report for the Buffalo General Electric Co., showing that in 1930 it had returns of $5,186,533 and for 1931, $5,613,237.

I find that the returns of the Niagara Power Co., for instance, were less in 1931 than 1930, that company having for its chief customers those engaged in industrial enterprises, and furnishing energy for power instead of light.

Here, Mr. President, if we desire additional revenue, which seems to be necessary, is an opportunity to get it to the extent of $50,000,000, without imposing any hardship whatever upon the industry affected.

There are abundant reasons, as it seems to me, why the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska ought to have the favorable consideration of this body.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I had not the good fortune to listen to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska. I should like now to inquire of the Senator from Montana whether this tax may not with great facility and completeness be passed on to the consumers of electricity.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should say that this is a tax that could scarcely be passed on. Practically every State has its regulatory body; and in order to get it passed on to the consumer it will be necessary to apply to the local commission for readjustment of rates.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, from observation and experience, I have a very distinct impression that it can be passed on with the greatest facility and the greatest completeness, for the reason that there are thousands upon thousands of the smaller communities that have no system of meter inspection; and that, I take it, would be true of nearly every rural community. It is not always a question of the kilowatt charge that the consumer has to meet, but the reading of the meter, which very few individual consumers are provident enough to take note of.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I dare say that it would to some extent be passed on to the consumer. However, I would not regard that in this particular instance as a very serious objection to the imposition of the tax. I think, however, that as to by far the major part of the tax it will be impossible to pass it on.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have been very favorably impressed with the presentation of this matter by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. It seems to me, on the face of it, that it is a tax which may well be justified. In fact, I rise to ask the Senator from Nebraska, who said he presented the matter to the Finance Committee, what, if any, arguments were presented against it. Why did the Finance Committee give no consideration to it?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I do not think the matter was considered to any great extent, although I have been told by a representative of the Treasury Department who was before the committee that he opposed it on the general ground that he was opposed to a tax on gross income. But so far as giving facts or figures is concerned, or indicating why it would be an injustice, it is my understanding that there was no evidence and no statement made.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury opposed it, and for that reason the committee rejected it?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. BORAH. And he opposed it solely on the ground that he does not believe in a tax on gross income?

Mr. HOWELL. That is my understanding.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, whether the tax may or may not be passed on to the consumer—and I am very definitely of opinion that it will almost completely be passed on to the consumer—is it not, in its very essence, an example of a manufacturers' sales tax?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, of course the electric-power companies sell electrical energy. There is no doubt about that; and a tax on that is a sales tax to that extent. It is an excise tax, of course, just the same as other excise taxes in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Would it be any different than what we call the admission tax?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly. So are the automobile tax, the gasoline tax, and so forth.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that these companies can well afford to pay the tax. The same thought that the Senator from Virginia suggested, as to its being passed on, occurred to me when the Senator from Nebraska was presenting it; but there will be some difficulty in passing it on to a marked extent, because it can be done only through the operation or consent of the utility commissions. Of course, in time, if it remains, the companies will undoubtedly present it to the commissions as one of the items which they ought to take into consideration in fixing rates. Perhaps that in time would be taken into consideration and would be passed on.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] was discussing this matter this morning I asked him some questions for the purpose of illustrating the way this tax would affect the price of electricity. At the time it was suggested that such a tax be imposed—I think probably it was the time when the Senator from Nebraska first mentioned it here—there were, naturally, protests from various power companies. The one that interested me most was a protest coming from my State, to the effect that it might greatly increase the cost of the power generated at the Boulder Dam project for the use of the State of Nevada, it being the present policy of the State to utilize its portion of that power rather for the development of industries in the State than for profit.

This 3 per cent, if translated into a cost per kilowatt-hour of electric energy, would mean this: At the present time the State of Nevada has the right to purchase electricity generated at the Boulder Dam power house for approximately 2 mills per kilowatt-hour. This tax would add to it six one-hundredths of a mill. In other words, the tax to the State would be 2 mills and six one-hundredths of a mill. I know that our State could very easily stand adding six one-hundredths of a mill to 2 mills.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I take it that this revenue measure is intended to be only a temporary affair anyway, and will probably have passed its period of usefulness by the time any power is generated at Boulder Dam.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no question about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that whatever is the fact, it does not seem to be a practical problem so far as that project is concerned.

Mr. PITTMAN. I only asked the question with regard to the translation of the cost from a money basis to a cost-price basis in kilowatt-hours, because it was easy to see what the burden would be directly on the States.

Most individuals pay from 8 to 10 cents, I believe, per kilowatt-hour in little towns and homes, in the smaller places. If that 3 per cent were added, it might make quite a difference. Nevertheless it will be found that there is such an arbitrary fixing of rates as far as the user of a small amount of electricity is concerned that I doubt whether a company in dealing with that 3 per cent of its gross which is to be paid out of its net income would have very much excuse for requesting the local commission having charge of that matter for a raise.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that there are manufacturing establishments which pay as low as half a cent per kilotwatt-hour for their energy. Suppose that were passed on; the tax would amount to fifteen-thousandths of a cent, and it would be impracticable to add that. Suppose the rate were 3 cents per kilowatt-hour; it would be nine-hundredths of a cent, an addition of nine-tenths of 1 mill. In the case, for instance, of 5 cents it would be fifteen-hundredths of a cent additional. When any power company appealed to a commission for authority to pass that on, unless the commission were perfectly willing to act in accord with the power company's wishes, all they would have to say would be, "It will be necessary to go into a revaluation of your plant," and that would end the matter at once. No one wants a revaluation to-day.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think a fair tax should be uniform, and I want to ask the Senator a question. Is it not a fact that high rates for electric power are usually found in the smaller towns, where there are poor people—that is, people less able to pay than those in the large cities? To illustrate in another way, if a man lives next to the Boulder Dam, or some large plant like that on the St. Lawrence River, where the power is cheap, engaged in manufacture, is he not given a great advantage as compared with one in a small village, where there are a thousand people? Is not a man in a town of 500 or 1,000 or 5,000 people, paying about six or seven times as much as one in a large city?

Mr. HOWELL. No; Mr. President, that is not wholly true. In some of our large cities the rates are entirely out of line, and it is an amazing thing that the companies are allowed to charge such rates. For instance, in this city the maximum rate is now 3.9 cents per kilowatt-hour, indicating how low rates can be.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let us leave out the cities, and let us illustrate it in this way, that one living in a community distant from water power, where power is generated artificially—that is, by coal or steam—has a rate as much as three times that of a person living in some other place. I just want to call attention to what impressed me, that this tax would not be levied uniformly throughout the United States on the basis suggested. If a tax were levied based on the kilowatt-hour, that would be uniform; and if it were 3 per cent of the gross, if you take the case of a man living here, with a rate of 3.9 cents, and take what I pay in my home town, where I think the rate is 12 cents, it is found that I am forced to pay there over three times as much as the man here, on the basis of gross receipts. That is the point I am trying to illustrate.

Mr. HOWELL. It is true that neither adding a constant per kilowatt-hour nor my method would result in uniformity, because if we add a quarter of a cent per kilowatt-hour the manufacturing establishment using energy during the daytime and paying a half a cent a kilowatt-hour would then pay 50 per cent more for its power than otherwise.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, my opinion is that if we levied the tax based on the kilowatt-hour, that would be uniform. The proportion the tax would bear to the cost would be disproportionate, but the levy would be uniform.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in the House they proposed a quarter of a cent a kilowatt, and that was abandoned, I understand, because the big power user said, "This is an enormous increase. We will not be able to use this form of energy. We will have to change." So the House committee eliminated the proposal.

Mr. BROUSSARD. After all, the small user would be paying the same tax as the large user.

Mr. HOWELL. Not in proportion.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Not in proportion to the cost, but I am talking about levying a uniform tax. It is just like levying a tariff on shoes; if we put it at 50 cents a pair of shoes, irrespective of the cost, we are taxing the man who buys the $3 pair of shoes as much as the man who buys the $20 pair of shoes.

Mr. HOWELL. Suppose a man were paying 10 cents a kilowatt-hour, and suppose that were passed on; under my amendment it would be 3 mills per kilowatt that would be passed on.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I know; but I am talking about the uniformity of the tax. I do not think the Senator's proposal is uniform.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY (at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold his suggestion for a moment, I am advised by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the leader on the Democratic side, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], that the Finance Committee would like to have a little time in which to discuss the bill before reporting back to the Senate. If we have reached the point where we are about to vote on the pending amendment, I suggest that we take a recess until 2 o'clock, at which time I think the committee will be ready to go forward. If that is agreeable, I make that suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if I may, I withdraw the request for a quorum.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m., at which hour it reassembled, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted in convention assembled by the Grand Lodge Knights of Pythias of California, "The Golden Domain," stating, in part, "(1) That to Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh we express our most sincere sympathy and love. The colonel's fortitude during this darkest hour is the true test of heroism. That the dear mother shall be able to bear this and coming burdens is the prayer of every Pythian; (2) that we here and now renew our faith in our country and its flag, pledging anew our service and, if need be, our lives to aid the proper officers of the law in tracking to destruction the dastardly fiends who perpetrated the crime which has put a blotch of shame upon our country's honor; (3) that we may take back to our several subordinate lodges from this convention that it is the desire of this grand lodge as Americans, as Californians, and again as Knights of Pythias that each unit of our grand domain become a camp fire of Americanism that we may again create respect for God, our homes, and our constituted authority, and that we may play our part in stamping out the enemies from within and preventing the entrance of those from without," which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 14 (by Mr. Wimberly)

Whereas the cotton growers of the United States of America are facing dire calamity on account and by reason of the large production and low price of cotton staple; and

Whereas it is expedient and necessary at this time to do everything possible to benefit and assist this one of the greatest revenue producers of the country; and

Whereas there is now before the United States Congress a bill which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Agriculture to have cotton sold by net weight in place and instead of gross weight, which would enable the cotton grower to use bagging made of cotton for the covering of the cotton bales in place of jute bagging, which is predominantly used under the present method of sale; and

Whereas if it is made possible for the cotton grower to use cotton instead of jute bagging it will create a much greater market for his low-grade cotton, and thereby materially increase the price of the better grades; and

Whereas there are now on hand hundreds of thousands of bales of low-grade cotton that could be used economically for the manufacture of cotton bagging and which would be used if cotton was sold and marketed by net weight; and

Whereas all other commodities sold and marketed in the United States are sold by net weight rather than gross weight, and cotton should be rightfully placed on a parity with said other commodities; and

Whereas the cotton grower would be greatly benefited financially each year if this method is adopted; and

Whereas, on account of the difference in weight of cotton and jute bagging, the cotton farmer is practically prohibited from using his own product in the sale of his cotton: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana (the Senate concurring), That we recommend and advocate that the United States Congress pass the necessary legislation to have cotton sold by net weight in place and instead of gross weight as all other commodities are sold in the United States at this time: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of the Congressmen and Senators of the State of Louisiana, the United States Congress, the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States Congress, the President of the United States Senate, and Commissioner of Agriculture and the President of the United States.

I hereby certify that this is a true and correct copy as adopted by the Legislature of Louisiana on May 24, 1932.

THE KELLOGG-BRIAND PACT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short resolution adopted at a meeting in Boston on March 25 under the auspices of the World Peace Foundation.

The purport of the resolution is that Congress should authorize the calling of an international conference to develop an international policy to be followed by nations signatory to the treaty of Paris (Kellogg-Briand pact), in regard to signatory nations which violate article 2 of the pact by attempting to settle differences by other than pacific means.

This resolution, as I understand it, is in line with the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 140, introduced by me, which is intended to implement the Kellogg-Briand pact by making effective an embargo against the furnishing of munitions of war to a signatory nation which violates the Kellogg-Briand pact.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolution unanimously passed at a meeting held in Boston on March 25, 1932, under the auspices of the World Peace Foundation

We favor enactment of a measure that will authorize our Government to call or participate in an international conference in case of any threat of nonfulfillment of article 2 of the treaty of Paris (Kellogg-Briand pact).

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

A message in writing from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on May 28, 1932, the President approved and signed the act (S. 3111) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, inasmuch as there are very few other matters now to be considered, and notwithstanding the order heretofore entered that we recess at 7.30 o'clock p. m., I ask unanimous consent that that order be vacated and that we remain in session to-day until we finish the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I share with the Senator from Mississippi a sincere desire that we may finish the bill to-day. But, obviously, we do not want to put it in the control of a single Senator to force us into a long, all-night session. Would it not be better to ask unanimous consent merely to vacate the order for a recess at 7.30 o'clock p. m.?

Mr. HARRISON. I submit that request at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to vacating the order heretofore made for a recess at 7.30 p. m. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Finance Committee has been in session to-day for two or three hours for the purpose of arriving at amendments to the pending bill that will bring sufficient revenue to balance the Budget. We agreed upon certain amendments recommended by the Treasury, and we have the solemn word of the Secretary of the Treasury that if these amendments are agreed to by the Senate the Budget will be balanced.

There are three of the amendments, one of which we have already agreed to, that being the Connally amendment. The next is a tax on gasoline of 1 cent per gallon at the refinery, and the third is a tax of 5 per cent on electric energy to be paid by the consumer, which will raise $60,000,000. In other words, the three items will raise $251,000,000, which would give us a few million dollars more than we lack now to balance the Budget as recommended by the Treasury.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] has offered an amendment proposing a tax upon electric energy and gas as well. The committee, however, have taken this into consideration and propose a tax on electric energy and gas. I send to the desk the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 286, after line 19, insert a new part, as follows:

PART —. TAX ON ELECTRIC ENERGY AND GAS

SEC. —. TAX ON ELECTRIC ENERGY AND GAS

(a) There is hereby imposed a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid on or after the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act, for electric energy for domestic consumption or gas for domestic consumption furnished after such date and before July 1, 1933, to be paid by the person paying for such electric energy or gas and to be collected by the vendor.

(b) Each vendor receiving any payments specified in subsection (a) shall collect the amount of the tax imposed by such subsection from the person making such payments, and shall on or before the last day of each month make a return, under oath, for the preceding month, and pay the taxes so collected, to the collector of the district in which his principal place of business is located, or if he has no principal place of business in the United States, to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe. The commissioner may extend the time for making returns and paying the taxes collected, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe with the approval of the Secretary, but no such extension shall be for more than 90 days.

(c) No tax shall be imposed under this section upon any payment received for electric energy or gas furnished to the United States or to any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this subsection shall be evidenced in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, this amendment would be an outrage upon the domestic consumers of the country. Who is it that is paying the electric companies the highest rates? The domestic consumer. Who is it that is getting the benefit of rates below cost? The large consumer. This amendment would also exclude the commercial consumer, the department stores, the grocery stores, all stores. This amendment would put upon the householders of the country a tax of 5 per cent upon their electric energy to be collected from the householder.

It is a sales tax of the worst character. It is a sales tax that will be collected. It can not be avoided unless a change is made in the form of illumination. It is a sales tax on the heat required in the cooking of every meal. The great department stores, the big users of electric energy, the users of electricity for elaborate lighting, are to be excluded, and in order to raise $55,000,000 the committee have raised the tax of 3 per cent, which I have proposed, up to 5 per cent, but upon the domestic use of electricity only.

Why, Mr. President, this is an amendment that must have had its origin in the power companies themselves. There is no chance to avoid the payment of this sales tax by any domestic consumer. I can not imagine under what circumstances the committee could have been influenced to propose such an infamous tax on the homes of this country.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. May I suggest that I am absolutely in accord with what the Senator has stated? The proposal was made in the Finance Committee for a general sales tax, to be paid by the vendor. I was called out of the committee room before the amendment was completed, and it is not in accordance with the proposal I made to the committee at all that the amendment should provide for a general sales tax on the sale of all power to be paid by the vendor. I want to go on record that I did not approve this particular amendment and am not in accord with the manner in which it is drafted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what objection there could possibly be to charging the tax against the vendor and letting the vendor pay it? Certainly he gets the profit.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there would be a particle of difference; if the tax were imposed upon the manufacturer, he would simply pass it on to the consumer in the price charged.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There might be a way to avoid that.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee thought otherwise.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why not charge it to the vendor in the first place and let the vendor pay it, as he really should pay it?

Mr. SMOOT. The committee desires to get through with this bill and to balance the Budget. We have heard much about doing that, and we want to do it. As I previously stated, every day the passage of the bill is delayed $2,000,000 are lost to the Treasury of the United States. It seems to me the time has come that the Senate should decide whether or not it is going to pass the pending bill.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the question is whether we are going to take this money out of the little homes. The humblest of our homes are now equipped with electrical energy, and it is now proposed to put a tax on those homes and to put a tax on them for one reason—because it is not desired to put a tax on admissions to the movies below 41 cents. There are many people in this country who must have electric light who can not afford to go to the movies. The movie is not a necessity; electricity is a necessity. The House excluded in its proposed sales tax clothing and food because they are necessities. Electricity is to-day a necessity, and it is now proposed to tax it.

Mr. President, the amendment I have proposed is of an entirely different nature. My amendment proposes to tax the big power users, the department stores, the banks, the theaters, and to impose a tax also on the energy used by domestic consumers.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. How much would the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska probably yield if it should be adopted?

Mr. HOWELL. My amendment, on its face, will yield $58,000,000, but I wanted to be conservative in my estimate, and I have stated here that it would yield at least $50,000,000. My amendment, however, does not cover gas, while the pending amendment does cover gas. I have an amendment here which I have prepared covering gas, and if a tax on gas be added to my amendment, it will bring in more money than the pending substitute.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. What is the estimate that the amendment pending will yield to the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. It is estimated that it will yield a revenue of $60,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I was out of the Chamber for a moment. The second question of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] was as to "the pending amendment." Is not my colleague's amendment "the pending amendment"?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator from Oklahoma asked what would be the amount of revenue derived from the committee amendment should it be adopted.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I meant the amendment which has been submitted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. But that is not the pending amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. No; that is not the pending amendment; it is a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Utah is a substitute amendment?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I want to make clear the nature of my amendment. I will read it. It is as follows:

On page 243, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. There is hereby imposed upon energy sold by privately owned, operating electrical power companies a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the price for which so sold, payable from net income but not otherwise."

This amendment means that the tremendously profitable power companies of this country will indeed come to the rescue of the Treasury, but the substitute proposed, Mr. President, means that the home owner must come to the rescue of the Treasury—the home owner must substitute for the power companies.

As I have already said, in my opinion it is a sales tax in its most infamous form, a sales tax upon a necessity. No one has been brave enough heretofore to propose a sales tax upon a necessity; but here in the last hours of the consideration of this bill the committee comes forward with an amendment of such character. If the head and front of the great Power Trust of the country were seated at that table in front of the Vice President and were asked to write an amendment for this purpose, the substitute which has been offered is exactly what he would write.

I understand that one of the arguments advanced for relieving power consumers—I am speaking of power consumers who use electrical energy for power only—was that they would be placed at a disadvantage because of this tax as compared with the manufacturing establishments which produce their own energy. Mr. President, assume that a manufacturing concern were paying 5 mills for its electrical energy—one-half of a cent—under my amendment how much would that manufacturing establishment pay if the tax were passed on? It would pay fifteen one-thousandths of a cent additional. Such a tax would never be passed on. Suppose a manufacturing establishment were paying 1 cent a kilowatt-hour. If the tax were passed on to that manufacturing concern, what would it pay? It would pay three one-hundredths of a cent additional; and yet the committee proposes to relieve such manufacturing establishments of even that trifling amount. When it comes to the rates being paid by the department stores, the theaters, the hotels, the big concerns not engaged in manufacturing, 3 cents is about the rate they pay. Under my amendment how much would they pay? They would pay nine one-hundredths of a cent additional per kilowatt-hour, if the tax were passed on, but under my amendment it would not be practicable to pass on the tax.

Mr. President, it would be an outrage to adopt the substitute amendment now proposed. If we can not have a proper tax levied on the power companies we should have none; such a levy as this should be defeated, because, as I have before stated, it is a sales tax of the worst possible character upon a necessity.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the only objection voiced upon this floor—and it could scarcely be called an objection—to the amendment tendered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] was expressed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. It could scarcely be called an objection, for he simply inquired whether the tax would not be passed on to the consumer. That was the only objection or anything in the nature of an objection that was heard upon this floor directed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. But now, however, it is proposed not only that the tax shall be passed on to the consumer but only to the domestic consumer, a proposition that it seems to me is utterly indefensible. I can not think that the Senate is going to make that change in the proposal which is now before us.

Let us inquire about this matter, Mr. President. How many homes in this country are now consumers of electricity? I have before me Moody's Manual of Utilities, which tells us that in the year 1927, 63 per cent of the homes of this country were supplied with electricity; that in 1928, 66 per cent were so supplied; that in 1929 the percentage was 68, and that in 1930 it was 70; and according to the information given to us this morning by the Associated Gas & Electric Co. the number has increased since that time, having been greater in 1931 than in 1930, and it continues to increase.

Mr. President, what is the reason for confining this tax to the domestic consumers of electricity? Who can defend anything of that kind? What are the facts with respect to that matter? From the same source we learn that the revenue derived by the electric-power companies of the country from domestic consumption produces 6.4 cents per kilowatt-hour, while the average return of the companies from all sources, industrial as well as domestic, is only 2.68 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. I wonder if the Senator has the information showing the comparative amounts received from domestic users and industrial users.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The figures are available, but I do not have them conveniently at hand at the moment. I can furnish the information by an examination of the record.

Mr. GLENN. I shall not press the request if the information is not conveniently available.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In other words, Mr. President, the consumers throughout the country are now paying per kilowatt-hour an average of 6.4 cents, while the average of all the country for all energy used is 2.68 cents per kilowatt-hour. So the domestic consumers, now obliged to pay about three times as much as the average cost to all consumers, are to be burdened with a tax, while the other consumers are to be allowed to go free. The proposal seems to me to be so outrageous that I can not help but think that it was returned by the Finance Committee simply because they had not the time to inquire into it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I find myself in accord with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Montana, and I merely want to make an observation. In the event Congress should tax the power and insist that the tax be paid by the vendor, if that were clearly the intent of Congress, I can not bring myself to believe that the public-service commission of any of the various 48 States would ever permit that tax to be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. However that may be, Mr. President, I feel perfectly satisfied that this matter could not have had from the Finance Committee the consideration that it deserves; and I can see no reason at all why the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] should not be adopted substantially in the form in which it was offered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am utterly unable to understand this committee substitute. I am unable to get the viewpoint, the idea, of proposing this amendment as a substitute for the one offered by my colleague. To me it is absolutely incomprehensible that as between the two amendments we should be asked to take the committee amendment.

I can not escape the conviction that the proponents of this substitute must be going on the theory that we have practically finished this bill. We have just listened to an address from the President, part of which we heard, and they are going on the theory that in our attempt to rush this bill through and to pass it to-day we are going to follow the request of the committee and swallow this amendment.

To me it is an outrageous proposition, an indefensible proposition. The only objection I have heard made to the original amendment—the pending amendment, for which this is offered as a substitute—was that it might be passed on to the consumer. I do not believe any other objection was made. Those who were opposed to it said, "We do not like this amendment because we are afraid these great corporations, the Electric Trust, will pass on the tax to the consumer." The committee amendment relieves all doubt on that question. It does not pretend to tax anybody but the consumer.

To be frank, I believe that there is some reason in the objection that sometimes it will be possible to pass on the tax to the consumer under my colleague's amendment; but there are several obstacles in the way before it can be done.

In the first place, when the amount is reduced down to a kilowatt-hour basis, the amount is so small that it will be difficult to pass it on. In the next place, the companies never can pass it on unless they are allowed to pass it on by the public-service commissions of the various States.

Those of you who have been fighting Muscle Shoals legislation and fighting Federal Government interference have been doing it all along on the theory that State commissions stood between the consumer and harm. You have more faith in State commissions than I have. Take your own doctrine now, when you are thinking about this tax being passed on. If your State commission is effective and efficient, it will not be passed on. There you are. That is the only objection. It is proposed now to offer a substitute in the place of the original amendment that takes away even that objection, and, as the Senator from Montana said, confines the payment of the tax to the domestic consumer. That means that the home, the fireside, must pay it all. On the face of the amendment, it must pay it all.

Your State commission could not stop it if they wanted to. The tax is put upon the home to begin with. It is a tax upon a necessity of the home life of every family in the United States. There is no escape from that. Read the amendment. That is what it says. Nobody disputes that that is what it means; and that is offered as a substitute for an amendment that at least makes it difficult to pass the burden on.

The millionaire who uses, every day, hundreds and hundreds of horsepower of electricity pays nothing under this substitute—not one cent. I have not any estimates of figures from experts; but I should think that that would very materially reduce the revenue that would be collected under this amendment. That is not true of my colleague's amendment. That tax is levied on all electricity.

Mr. President, I believe the Senate understands what this question is. If the Senate believes that this burden should be levied entirely upon the domestic consumer, then it will vote for the substitute offered by the Senator from Utah in behalf of the committee.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GLENN. I should like to obtain the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska concerning a matter involved in this amendment. I wonder why it is that this tax is limited to the domestic consumer, excluding the industrial consumer mentioned by the Senator from Nebraska.

The reason advanced to me was that some large department stores or large industrialists, for instance, have their own power plants, and that if this tax was fixed only upon those who purchase industrial power, or power for lighting large stores, those operating their own plants would have an advantage.

I am wondering—and this is a question upon which I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska—if a provision could not be properly written into the amendment fixing this tax upon consumption rather than upon the amount paid, so that those who consume power, even these large industrialists, even if they produce it at their own plants, could be required to pay a tax in proportion to that of their competitors who do not operate their own plants.

I do not see why that could not be done. It certainly would improve the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume it could be done, but it is not done under this amendment.

Mr. GLENN. No; but I was just wondering if the Senator does not think it could be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt that it could be done.

Mr. GLENN. Then that argument in favor of this amendment would be done away with, it seems to me.

Mr. NORRIS. That would not make the committee amendment acceptable to me as compared with the amendment offered by my colleague, even if that were done.

Mr. GLENN. It would be some improvement, though.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether or not the amendment of his colleague would raise the same revenue as the proposed amendment of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not heard what the committee amendment proposes, what revenue it is suggested that it will raise. The amendment of my colleague will raise between fifty and sixty million dollars.

Mr. PITTMAN. I assume, however, that it could be changed so as to raise the same amount of revenue.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator another question.

We will assume that the rental for electricity in a small house is $6 a month. Three per cent on that would be 18 cents. The total bill would be $6.18 if the total tax on gross receipts were passed on.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator believe that an electric-light company would attempt to obtain a change of a rate for the purpose of obtaining 18 cents on that $6 account?

Mr. NORRIS. I should not think so.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, I have taken an extreme case. That is a very small rental; but, on the other hand, would it not be natural, where the increase in price to users is so small, that the company would rather offset that as against its corporation tax in the form of taxes paid, and that it probably would not result in much increase to the consumer?

Mr. NORRIS. That might be. I should think so.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question. What is the idea of the Senator from Utah about a municipal plant generating and distributing electricity to the citizens of the municipality?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will read the amendment, and then the Senator can see plainly what it says.

Mr. NORRIS. I have read the amendment. I have some doubt about that after reading it.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment reads:

There is hereby imposed a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act for electric energy for domestic consumption or gas for domestic consumption furnished after such date and before July 1, 1933, to be paid by the person paying for such electric energy or gas and to be collected by the vendor.

Of course, Mr. President, if any charge was made, and the payment was made, he would have to pay the tax. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that is proper. I am inclined to think the Senator is right.

Mr. President, the municipal plants that are supplying electricity to the citizens of the municipality have come into existence almost entirely because of exorbitant rates or bad treatment on the part of private companies supplying municipalities in the past. They are in the nature of a cooperative institution. There is no profit in it. There is no profit to anybody. The municipality owns the plant. It is their own plant. They manufacture electricity and sell it to themselves. Nobody makes any money. It is just like a cooperative organization of farmers that are raising, handling, and selling wheat. Congress heretofore has gone on the theory—and I think it is a perfectly proper theory—that in such a case, where nobody makes a profit, where it is a properly organized cooperative association, no tax should be levied upon the business. Hence we relieve them from taxation.

A municipality supplying itself with electricity is in the same category. There is no reason why they should have to pay the Government a fee for the electricity which they themselves consume. Indirectly, that would be taxing a division of a State. It is just the same as though we would levy a tax on every State in the Union, and require the State to pay it. So far we have proceeded on the theory that levying a tax upon a municipality would be unconstitutional. That has been avoided in this case by going directly to the consumer, and making him pay a tax on the electricity he consumes.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I was wondering what the Senator would say if his colleague's amendment were changed so as to take out of line 4 the words "payable from net income but not otherwise." It seems to me that involves a difficulty which might curb the tax considerably.

Mr. NORRIS. The object, as I understand, is to favor the corporation producing the electricity, so that it will not be required to pay the tax if it has no net income.

Mr. COUZENS. As long as we have adopted so-called excise taxes and general taxes applying to candy and gum and motor cars, straight sales taxes, and no reference is made to the question of whether the manufacturers have net income or otherwise, and they pay the tax whether they have a loss or a profit, I was wondering why the same theory should not apply to the power companies.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know any reason why, but I presume the object of putting the amendment in was to be extraordinarily careful not to impose any burden upon any of these corporations which might be construed as being unpopular.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, that applies to every other industry on which we have levied an excise tax.

Mr. NORRIS. It does.

Mr. COUZENS. I would be very glad to support the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Nebraska, the Senator's colleague, if it were made a straight excise tax, the same as on all other industries.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection myself to have the words referred to by the Senator from Michigan stricken out.

Mr. COUZENS. It seems to me the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska with those words stricken out is a better amendment than the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator entirely.

Mr. President, I can not believe that the Senate is going to adopt this substitute amendment. It seems to me that whether it is intended to be so or not, the effect of it would be to take advantage of the anxiety of the Senate to pass the pending bill and to influence them, in that great anxiety, which is unanimous here on the part of all Senators, to pass it and pass it at once. While we are under the influence of that feeling, while we are in that state of mind, the committee brings in an amendment to take the place of another amendment, and in my judgment the substitute has no merit whatever, if we want to be just and if we want to be fair.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, naturally I am disposed to support the committee, on account of the exigencies of the situation, but I would like to have some views of the members of the committee as to why this substitute is preferable to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. This is a subject which gave the House Ways and Means Committee a great deal of perplexity and they worked over it for two or three weeks. The Committee on Finance started out with a study—a very brief one, I am afraid—of the Howell amendment. It was pointed out to us that it would make a serious difference in the competitive situation between those large producers in industry which manufacture their own power and the smaller producers who purchase power; that it would put a handicap on those who have to buy their power. That was one thing.

In the next place, it was felt that it would tend to add to the cost of production at a time when all men are fighting to keep down costs. That was another fact.

For both those reasons the committee decided that a tax on the domestic current was the wiser method of taxation. In the long run the tax comes out of the human beings who constitute the country, anyway, no matter how we put on the tax. We did not want to impose a tax which would place a competitive handicap on those people who usually are the smaller, more embarrassed producers.

Mr. BORAH. One other question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an observation before we pass that?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The reason now suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania occurred to me, and I should like to submit to the consideration of the Senate an addition to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, in the following language:

In the case of electrical energy not sold but used by the producer, he shall pay a tax equal to 3 per cent of the fair price of the energy so used.

Mr. REED. There again we would enter into difficulty. That would result in the imposition of a tax on every Delco on a farm in the country. It would tax anybody who produces electricity in any form. The same idea was advanced to the committee. When one thinks of it, he realizes that electricity is produced by people for their own use, all the way from the huge generators of 100,000 horsepower down to the tiny generator we find in a rural telephone, which generates electricity when one winds the crank. Electricity is produced in every automobile. It is produced in every Delco electric-lighting outfit, as I have said. It would not be practicable to do what the Senator suggests.

The subject is so difficult that we are not satisfied with our amendment, but we are satisfied that it probably will work out better than the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. Anyway, the tax will last for only one year. We put that limitation on because we wanted to study the matter again next winter. It is a very difficult question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, why was it thought necessary to confine the burden to the domestic users?

Mr. REED. Just for the reasons I have stated. If we put the tax on industrial consumption, we impose a handicap upon the smaller producers everywhere, as against the larger producers who make their own power.

Mr. BORAH. I understand.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania why the committee excluded commercial use of electricity.

Mr. REED. For somewhat the same reason. Putting a tax on the electricity used in a shop or in a department store or in some such institution as that, it was felt, would be an unfair handicap on those concerns as against those which produce their own power. Apply it only to domestic consumption, and the factor of competition does not enter into it.

Understand me, please. The Finance Committee was not in love with this amendment. Nobody particularly urged it. We felt we were driven to it, and we tried to make it as light a hardship as possible.

Mr. HOWELL. Does the Senator think that it is just and proper to impose this tax on the domestic consumer alone, and exclude every business interest up and down the streets of Washington?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I really do. Take the tax to be levied under the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. It is perfectly conceivable that it would amount to 100 per cent of the net income of some of these producers, not the big power trusts, of course; probably their net income is a lot more than 3 per cent of their gross, but there is many a little company hanging on by its eyelids today, and if we impose a tax of 3 per cent on its gross, it would eat up every penny of its net.

Mr. NORRIS. The tax is on the sale, is it not?

Mr. REED. It is, and therefore it is a tax on the gross income of every producer of electric current, and in many cases, far too many, I am sorry to say, the net incomes of those producers are less than 3 per cent of their gross. We would take every penny of their incomes.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, would the Senator give me one example where a tax of 3 per cent would take the net earnings of an electric-power plant?

Mr. REED. I am not sufficiently advised to refer the Senator to anyone by name, but we were so told by the officials of the Treasury, and it must be so, otherwise we would not find some of them failing.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, there certainly is great consideration for the business interests of this country. The committee would tax the little home owner, but they would exclude all the business interests from the operation of this tax.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the amendment I suggested could easily be framed so as to exclude the poor little Delco owner, by just adding to it the words "otherwise than in domestic consumption," so that it would read:

> In the case of electric energy not sold but used by the producer, he shall pay a tax equal to 3 per cent of the fair price of the energy so used, otherwise than in domestic consumption.

I own a little electric-light plant, and I am perfectly willing to pay a tax, but if the Senator from Pennsylvania would like to exclude me, and those like me, he can do it by this simple amendment I have suggested.

Mr. REED. The amendment is not so simple as it sounds. We would find the Treasury going around and putting a tax on every Delco that operated a cream separator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Suppose they do?

Mr. REED. Does the Senator want to put the United States Government in the business of hunting up the operator of every cream separator in the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The United States Government is in the business of hunting up everybody who has any income.

Mr. REED. On a permanent tax policy. This tax is to last only one year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say frankly that when the Finance Committee met to-day the first subject considered was the question of a tax on admissions. The Senate turned down the recommendation of the committee. The committee reported an amendment fixing a tax on admissions starting with admissions of 11 cents. Fifty-five million dollars in revenue was stricken from the bill by the action of the Senate. We have to make that up in some way. The amendments we have suggested are the two ways the committee had to make up the loss and to balance the Budget.

Mr. BORAH. I realize that, but what I think most of us are interested in is the advantage of this amendment over the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania has covered that thoroughly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee offered as a substitute for the amendment of the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. I understand a vote "yea" sustains the action of the Finance Committee. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct. The question is on the substitute of the committee. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is necessarily absent from the city. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I am unable to obtain a transfer; so I must withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I am informed that my pair, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. Upon this question he is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. If Senator BROOKHART were present, he would vote "nay." If Senator WATERMAN were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that my pair, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], has not voted. Therefore I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate as a delegate in attendance upon the Geneva Arms Conference.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. SMOOT's amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. ASHURST. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers the following substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska:

(a) There is hereby imposed a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid on or after the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act for electric energy for commercial or domestic consumption or gas for commercial or domestic consumption furnished after such date and before July 1, 1933, to be paid by the person paying for such electric energy or gas and to be collected by the vendor.

(b) Each vendor receiving any payment specified in subsection (a) shall collect the amount of the tax imposed by such subsection from the person making such payments and shall, on or before the last day of each month, make a return, under oath, for the preceding month, and pay the taxes so collected to the collector of the district in which his principal place of business is located, or if he has no principal place of business in the United States, to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe. The commissioner may extend the time for making returns and paying the taxes collected, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, with the approval of the Secretary, but no such extension shall be for more than 90 days.

(c) No tax shall be imposed under this section upon any payment received for electric energy or gas furnished to the United States or to any State or Territory or political subdivision thereof or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this subsection shall be evidenced in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, with the words " commercial or " inserted the provision will raise more money than the original substitute. I have not yet obtained any estimate of the amount, although I tried to do so. It will raise more money than the original substitute.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean this latest proposal or the Howell amendment will raise more money?

Mr. SMOOT. The substitute offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania will increase the amount of revenue over and above the amount which would have been raised by the amendment which was just defeated.

Mr. GLASS. I want to vote against any proposition that will raise more money, because all of it will be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. REED. Yes; it is a direct tax on the consumer of electricity. The whole effect of the change made in the substitute as against the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah and just rejected is that we now tax the electric energy sold for commercial as well as domestic use. That means that we shall get a revenue out of electricity sold to shops and offices and places of that sort, and it will add substantially to the revenue expected under the committee amendment. The committee's suggestion was criticized by some Senators because it did not tax the commercial users. I want, if I can, to satisfy that objection, and that is why I have offered the new substitute.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as I understand, the whole purpose is to tax the consumer directly rather than to tax the company or corporation?

Mr. REED. Exactly. It is just like the war-time tax on transportation. It would be added to the bill, expressly stated to be a tax; it would be collected by the vendor of the gas or electricity and paid by the vendor to the Government.

Mr. GLASS. In either event, the consumer will pay the tax?

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as I understood the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, it provided for a tax of 3 per cent on the gross revenue of power or electric concerns, and in order that that should be passed on to the consumer it would be necessary for State public-utilities bodies to meet and give their consent for an increase in rates. Is that correct?

Mr. REED. In many cases that would be true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Wherever the law of any State provides that an increase in rates to the consumer can not be charged except by consent of the public-utilities body and that body did not give its consent, the tax would be paid out of the gross income of the producer; but in States where the commission could and would meet and give consent it would be passed on to the consumer. The chances are that in some States it would be passed on to the consumer and in others it would not be.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that respect there would be some inequality in the payment of the taxes due to the decision in each State.

Mr. REED. There would be a discrimination in that way just as there would be a further discrimination between the large concerns which manufacture their own electricity and pay no tax, and those that have to buy electricity and would pay the tax.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. As I pointed out to-day, when we had under consideration the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, that in any event this tax may be passed on to the consumer with greater facility and more completely than any tax that I know anything about. No matter what the State commissions may do, the rural communities and the smaller urban communities will have to pay this tax, for the reason that there is no system of meter inspection in the rural communities or in the smaller urban communities, and no matter what the charge per kilowatt-hour if those who are selling the electricity are to compute the kilowatt-hours they are going to exact all they may from the consumer.

Mr. President, during the six months I have been in attendance upon the Senate I have had bills from the electric-light company in my town, and they charged me as much for the six months that I was here in Washington and did not have a light burning in my house as they charged me when the house was ablaze for the six months when I was at home. I deliberately permitted them to do it. I did not pay the bills as they came in, to see how long they would send them. At the end of six months I demanded a refund for the total six months that they had charged me when I did not use any electricity.

That is merely a sample of what will be done if this impost shall be charged, if this sales tax—and it is nothing but a sales tax in essence—is imposed. If we are going to have a sales tax on everything and exempt stock gamblers in New York, as we did on Saturday, from a tax on their transfers of stock, it seems to me we are in pretty bad shape.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] that if a State commission is appealed to to increase the rate in order that the power company may escape the burden of this tax it by no means follows that the appeal will be successful. Electric light and power rates are not adjusted by such commissions every week or every month or even every year. The rates generally run along pretty much as they have been for the last five years, notwithstanding the fact that the expenses of the companies now are very much less than they were two years ago. The increase in their profits in 1931 over those of 1930 arises very largely from the fact that their expenses have been reduced; wages have been reduced, their material has been reduced in cost, and, in addition to that the use of electricity has expanded. The household is consuming more, and consequently the profits to the companies are larger. So it does not by any means follow if a State commission were appealed to to increase the rate, because of the tax put upon the company producing the power that it would succeed in getting the rate increased; but if it did the responsibility would be with the commission of the particular State which was unfortunate enough to be in that situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, I am not concerned so much about the method by which this tax is levied. We are all confronted with the necessity of raising a certain amount of money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And apparently there is a consensus of opinion that it ought to be raised on power.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is why the Senate Committee on Finance brought this amendment in here to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. But if we may assume that all these State commissions are doing their duty, they are not allowing power companies to charge any more than they ought to charge in order to secure a fair return. It may be, and probably is, true that in some localities where wages have declined and other costs have declined the companies are able to make a larger profit out of charges already legalized than they were able to make at the time the charges were fixed by the commissions. However, it seems to me that in States where there is a commission which must pass on any increases in rates, if they either withhold their consent to an increase, assuming that they do perform their duty to the extent of holding rates down within a reasonable basis, there would be some inequality and discrimination as between the citizens of one State where the local company could pass the tax on to the consumer, and the citizens of other States where it could not be passed on.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course those inequalities exist now. The rates in some States are very high; they run as high as 8 cents per kilowatt-hour. Here in the District 3 cents and a half is the maximum rate. Those inequalities exist anyway.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true, and it is due to conditions in each State and to the type of public service commission in each State. There is nothing that Congress can do about those inequalities, but here we are levying a tax which, under the Constitution at least, theoretically, must be equal in all parts of the United States; and I am wondering whether, under the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, that result would be attained?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would not think that that would be a very serious objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to a question that has arisen in my mind, namely, whether the language should be in the alternative or in the conjunctive? Where the amendment reads "electrical energy for domestic consumption or gas for domestic consumption," it would seem to require the use of the word "and" rather than "or." I merely bring it to the attention of the author of the amendment for such consideration as he may think necessary.

Mr. REED. My attention has been called by one of the experts from the Treasury to the fact that the tax is on the amount paid and not on the gas or the electricity itself, and, that being so, I think the correct conjunction to be used is "or."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Is "industrial" included in "commercial"? I notice in the hearings the words "industrial" and "commercial" were used.

Mr. REED. No; industrial is not included.

Mr. HARRISON. Should not that be included?

Mr. REED. I do not think so, because in that case there would result the inequity as between the big concern that makes its own power and the little one that does not.

Mr. President, I believe, having included "commercial" in this proposed amendment, that we can with propriety reduce the rate to 4 per cent, and I will accept an amendment to that extent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator modify the amendment?

Mr. REED. I change the amendment to read "4 per cent" instead of "5 per cent."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator modifies his amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield the floor?

Mr. REED. I yield the floor.

Mr. COUZENS obtained the floor.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what proportion of the electrical power used is for industrial purposes?

Mr. REED. We are trying to get the precise figures from the Treasury at this moment.

Mr. HOWELL. It is nearly one-half, is it not?

Mr. REED. For industrial purposes?

Mr. HOWELL. For industrial purposes.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOWELL. Very well. Now suppose we included industrial use. How much could the rate then be reduced?

Mr. REED. Probably we could reduce it to 3 per cent. We could not cut it in half because the amount paid for electricity for industrial purposes is very much less than that paid for commercial purposes.

Mr. HOWELL. In other words, then, under the amendment proposed by the Senator if electricity used for industrial purposes were included, the rate would be the same as that in my amendment, namely, 3 per cent?

Mr. REED. Yes; with this important difference, that the Senator's amendment would rest upon the companies, while this rests upon the consumers.

Mr. HOWELL. That is exactly the proposition. The Senator proposes to tax the home owners and I propose to tax the power companies.

Mr. REED. We are already taxing the power companies in the general corporation tax.

Mr. HOWELL. True; but we are also already taxing the home owners who have an income sufficient to pay an income tax and they are also paying the indirect taxes.

Mr. REED. I can answer the question the Senator from Nebraska asked a moment ago, if the Senator from Michigan will bear with me for a moment, by saying that we have an estimate now from the Treasury Department that at the rate of 4 per cent the amended substitute will yield $77,000,000 a year.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I want to point out that this is the only commodity of necessity, the only commodity that the people have to have, as to which under the bill there is an attempt to place the tax directly on the consumer. In the case of every other excise tax it is provided that the manufacturer or producer must pay the tax. There is nothing said as to whether he shall pass it on or pay it out of his own pocket, but we take the trouble in this proposed amendment specifically to relieve the power companies and say to them that they must collect from the users and in turn pay the tax to the Government. I am unable to understand why we should depart from the policy which we have been following with respect to all other items, and when it comes to power say to the power companies, "We are not going to tax you but we are going to require you to tax the consumer and then pay the amount thus collected to us."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator any doubt whatever that the tax on automobiles will be passed on to the consumer?

Mr. COUZENS. It is my view that it will; yes.

Mr. REED. And that the tax on talcum powder and mechanical refrigerators and the other curious conglomeration of objects taxed in this bill will be passed on to the consumer?

Mr. COUZENS. I think there may be some doubt where the tax affects the smaller items. When it comes to talcum powder and other cosmetics it is possible, but whether the tax will be passed on I do not know.

Mr. REED. Certainly the manufacturer will try to pass the tax on in every case.

Mr. COUZENS. I suspect he will, but what I wanted to point out is that Congress has not so specified in any other provision of the bill. We have not said to the motor-car manufacturers, nor to the cosmetic manufacturers, nor to the radio manufacturers, nor to the gum manufacturers, nor to the candy manufacturers, "You shall pass this tax on to the consumer; you will collect it and pay the amount collected to us."

Mr. REED. If the Senator will excuse me, I think we have said it in the case of the telegraph and telephone companies.

Mr. COUZENS. But in that case the tax is not on consumption. The Senator knows that I am talking about the consumption of goods, and the item he has mentioned is not a necessity. Here, however, is an absolute necessity, and it is the only thing in the bill as to which Congress says that the producer shall not pay, but he shall pass the tax on to the consumer and collect it from the consumer and in turn pay it to the Government.

Mr. REED. I think the consumer is going to pay all these taxes, and we are just fooling ourselves if we think he is not.

Mr. COUZENS. I am inclined to agree with the Senator, and, therefore, I want to leave out the provision in this amendment. I am perfectly willing to leave it to the power companies, the same as we have left it to the motor-car manufacturers and the candy manufacturers, to do whatever they choose in obtaining the tax. That is the reason I supported the Hull amendment. In this case, however, we go to the unheard-of extent of saying specifically to the power companies, "We will not require you to pay anything, but we demand that you collect the tax from the consumers and in turn pay the amount collected to the Government."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. In other words, the Senator from Michigan wants to return to painless taxation which nevertheless is taxation, rather than to the painful method the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes. I am opposed to both methods.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senate wants to recur to all the other excise taxes and make the same provision in them all and treat them all alike, I will not object, but I do object to one great, successful, powerful industry being selected and specifically being protected by the Federal Government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There is no certainty that the power company would be permitted to pass on the tax to the consumer under the Howell amendment, for the reason that the public-service commissions of the various States would have something to say about it. I submit that if it were given to the country that it was the intention of Congress that this tax should be paid by the vendor, the power company itself, in times like these at any rate, the public-service commissions in the various States would have no disposition whatever to pass the burden on to the consumers.

One other point, Mr. President, if the Senator will continue to yield:

Rates of public utilities have not been lowered in the slightest degree throughout the country—not to any appreciable extent, at any rate. While other business and industrial concerns have lowered the cost of their products, we find that the power product is still up at the same high figure that ruled back in 1929, before the depression came.

So it seems to me that the proposed substitute has all the weaknesses of the one just voted down by the Senate. It still taxes the consumer; and certainly here is one case where we can well tax the vendor with the hope that the tax will not be passed on to the consumer. My opinion is that it will not be passed on to the consumer.

Therefore, the substitute ought to be voted down, and we should proceed without any further delay to adopt the Howell amendment, and charge the tax to the vendor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am not so concerned as to what the power companies do. I do wish to point out that the consumer is protected by the State utility commissions; but in the case of all other excise taxes we have said plainly that the vendors shall pay us the tax. We have not said how they shall collect the tax. We have not said from what source they shall get it. We have not said whether they shall pass it on or not. We have said to the vendor, "We require the tax from you."

I am not trying to penalize the power companies or anybody else. I am saying that the power companies should be put on exactly the same basis, and then the public can rely on the State utility commissions to determine whether or not the tax should be passed on.

I yield now to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wanted to submit this observation to the Senator from Michigan:

If we may assume that this tax is to be passed on to the consumer, would it not be better for him to know, every time he pays an electric-light bill, precisely what he is paying in taxes, rather than to take a chance on the producer of the electric power charging more than the actual tax because it is blind, because the consumer will never know just how much tax he is paying?

That may be said of any other of these producers, whatever they may produce, in passing the tax on to the consumer; but is there not more likelihood that where it is covered up and blind, the consumer will ultimately pay more in tax than he would if he knew exactly how much the tax is on every bill that he pays to the producer?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, if the Senator has any confidence in any of the State utility commissions, which will have to authorize any increase in rate, he should not be apprehensive of that result.

I submit that an electric-light payer or a gas payer will have to receive the same rates that he now receives. He will not be required to pay the tax unless the State utility commission authorizes the utility company to increase its rate because of the tax. If the commission does that, the purchaser, of course, will know what the tax is.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, I do not express any lack of confidence in the State utility bodies; but the authorization for the increase might be in such general terms as to authorize a sort of blanket increase that would cover more than the tax.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, that is precisely the argument that will be used, because this tax will end in a year. Suppose the State commission have authorized an increase of 3 per cent to cover it. They may very well not meet at the end of the year to cut it down again; and the consumer will go on paying that additional 3 per cent long after the Federal Government ceases to get it.

One thing more, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. REED. My attention has been called to the fact that there are a good many municipally owned electric-light plants in the United States. I am told, for example, that in Omaha, Nebr., the electric-light plant is owned by the municipality.

Mr. HOWELL. I beg pardon, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWELL. It is not correct.

Mr. REED. Well, there are municipally owned plants in a number of cities. Those users of electric light would pay no tax under the Howell amendment; but under the substitute now offered those people would be on exactly the same footing as all other Americans and would pay the same tax.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not understand. Does the Senator mean to say that a municipal plant would pay the same tax?

Mr. REED. No. If we tax the company, the supplier or purveyor of the current, we can not tax a municipality.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. REED. Consequently the patrons of the municipality would not have to pay any tax or cover any tax in their remittances to the city; but the patrons of a private company would have to do that.

Mr. COUZENS. But are not they stockholders in this plant? We do not tax the stockholders of a corporation; and are not the citizens of a municipality owning its own electric-light plant the stockholders of the plant?

Mr. REED. We do tax stockholders of a corporation very heavily.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but not on their stock.

Mr. REED. On their dividends.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes; but if the corporation does not pay any dividends, we do not collect any tax.

Mr. REED. Yes; but in the case of a mutual concern like that they are getting the advantage of low rates.

Mr. COUZENS. But I have observed that in this bill we have exempted all the mutual companies.

Mr. REED. Not mutual electric-light companies.

Mr. COUZENS. But we have exempted all the mutual fire, cyclone, and other mutual companies to the same extent.

I am still unable, however, to see the purpose, in this one particular instance, of making provision by law that the consumer must pay the tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire first to ask a question.

I am of the opinion, and I want to know whether I am right or not, that the proposed substitute now pending is identical with the one we voted down, excepting that it includes commercial as well as domestic consumers. Is not that right?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President. There is the further difference that the rate in the pending substitute is 4 per cent, while in the one we voted down it was 5 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes! Are those the only differences?

Mr. REED. Those two changes are the only differences.

Mr. NORRIS. Then we are going to vote again upon the identical amendment that we once voted down, excepting that the rate is changed from 5 to 4 per cent, and it includes commercial lighting as well as domestic lighting?

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate, because it seems to me that that statement makes the question perfectly clear. We are really voting again upon the same amendment that we voted upon before. The Senator from Pennsylvania and others, however, have compared this tax with the tax levied upon automobiles and similar articles. I desire to call attention to the fact that all corporations and manufacturers of that kind are in competition. We are now coming to levy a tax upon what is almost universally a monopoly. A corporation having the right to generate and distribute electricity in a municipality is almost always given a monopoly of the business. So that we are asked now not to tax the monopoly, but to tax the consumer; not to make any levy of a tax upon the corporation that distributes the electricity, but to make it upon the consumer who has to buy it; and, since it is a necessity, he must have it. Since it is a monopoly, he can not get it anywhere else, as a general proposition.

I have a good deal of sympathy with the position taken by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] when he says that the companies will pass these taxes on. They will do their best always to pass them on; but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if the Howell amendment is adopted they are going to have some difficulty, at least, in passing the tax on. I do not believe that they will be successful in passing it on, at least for a year.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment.

The Senator from Pennsylvania calls attention to the fact that unless we adopt this substitute the probabilities are that these corporations will be collecting this tax and adding it to the consumer's bill long after the tax has ceased to exist. That could not be possible. That certainly is abhorrent.

When the Power Trust finds out that the Senator from Pennsylvania has made such a defamatory charge against them—that they would charge their customers something that they did not pay for themselves, and obtain money by false pretenses—they will come down upon his poor, overburdened shoulders with such criticism that it will drive him out of public life. That would not happen. On the other hand, if this tax is going to last only a year, it will take the companies at least a year in most cases to get permission to raise the rates when they have to go through the various State commissions; and hence the thing will be all over before they get the rate raised.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, in making the rates in the first place the utility commission takes into account the amount of taxes paid, rents, capital investment, overhead, and things of that character. If a new tax is added after the rate has been fixed by the commission, if the commission is honest—and we will assume that it is—and the utility company comes back to the commission and says, "Congress or the legislature has imposed upon me this tax which you did not consider," would not the commission, still being honest, without any hesitancy say, "We will allow you to increase the rates and pass it on"?

Mr. NORRIS. There might be instances where they would have to do that, but I submit to the Senator that that would not be a general rule. In the first place, as a rule, with perhaps some exceptions, before they change the rate they will have to make a valuation of the plant, which in itself would take more than a year to bring about.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will pardon just one further interruption, the rates are usually made by contract, are they not? And the order that is finally entered by a utility commission becomes a contract based upon the facts which were in existence at the time the order was made.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no! I do not think the Senator is right when he says they are made on contract.

Mr. LOGAN. If a new tax is added which the utility commission could not have considered, would it not be rather unusual for it to say: "We will not allow that to be passed on, although we know that it has been added, and you have that much greater burden"?

Mr. NORRIS. The amount that they pass on would not be as much as though they had a hailstorm or a snowstorm that tore down some of their transmission lines. The amount that it would cost them to go out and repair the transmission lines after a heavy storm that would tear down some of their lines would be more than the amount of the taxes they would have to pay. They do not take those things into consideration. Those are things that are liable to happen at any time.

If this tax is so small that it can hardly be computed when it is reduced to a kilowatt-hour basis, unless there was a showing that the company was losing money, or for some other reason was unable to get returns upon the value of the plant, I do not believe the utility commission would think of such a thing as allowing an increased rate on account of this tax.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I suggest that it is a dead moral certainty that this tax will be paid by the consumer under the substitute offered by the committee. Under the original amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], the consumer at least has a fighting chance. It may not be passed on to him.

Mr. NORRIS. And it can not be without considerable effort.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not without considerable effort. I am wondering why all the concern about its possibly being passed on to the consumer. Under the substitute he will pay it directly, but under the amendment offered originally by the Senator from Nebraska, at least, the consumer would have a chance. It may not be passed on to him. Therefore why not adopt the original amendment and give the consumer that chance?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to permit me to make this statement. With considerable experience in such matters, I never heard of any case of taxation where the consumer had a chance. He never has had and he never will have, and why not recognize it and put the tax on him in the beginning, because that is where it will get, with additions, unless we put the tax on him in the first place. In that way we could keep off the additions, which will be added to the tax before it gets to him, because the consumer, as the man least able to pay, always pays the tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to commend the Senator from Kentucky for his absolute fairness and his honesty in that statement. He has made a very fair statement, that the consumer has to pay the tax. Let us recognize that and put it on him to begin with. Let us take away all hope. The Howell amendment offers some hope. The Howell amendment offers an avenue of escape. It is intended to tax the corporation and not the consumer. That is a plain, fair statement of the amendment itself.

The corporations may find some way to get around it. They will try to, no doubt, and the Senator from Kentucky says they are going to succeed, that it is hopeless, that there is no use fighting them any longer. Let us lie down and let them walk over us and put the tax on the consumer to begin with.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I did not say it was hopeless, so far as the power companies are concerned. It is hopeless so far as all tax questions are concerned. All taxes are passed on in one form or another, and while, as the senior Senator from Nebraska says, the Howell amendment does give some hope, the hope it gives is not worth the almost certainty that if we do not provide that the consumer shall pay the tax in the first place, he will get it with additions when it reaches him, and those additions will be equal to or greater than any hope he may have under the Howell amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. It seems to me that a person must be very naïve who thinks that these rates for power are all made up according to the amount of taxes paid and the real valuation of the property of the power interests. To argue on the floor of the Senate at the present time that the power companies be allowed to charge rates based only on a fair valuation of their property, taking into consideration only the taxes they have paid, after the exposures which have been made by the Federal Trade Commission, it seems to me is perfectly ridiculous.

If we had never had the investigation, if we had never known what the power companies have been doing, if we had never known what the State commissions had allowed them in the way of rates, in the face of their valuations, then we might argue upon the floor of the Senate that the tax might be passed on, because they could make a showing that it would be necessary to pass it on. But I say that if anybody is familiar at all with the investigation which has been carried on by the Federal Trade Commission, he certainly can not contend, as the Senator from Kentucky has, that the taxes are necessarily passed on, or should be passed on.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will yield further, I only contend that the tax will be passed on, and, under the statement of the Senator from Montana, not only the tax will be passed on but a good deal more than the tax. We do not have a utility commission to regulate such rates down in my State, and I think we must get along better than do the people in States which do have commissions, from what I hear.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to know whether or not the Senator agrees with this suggestion or not, touching the statement of the Senator from Kentucky that the tax is always passed on. Where there is competition, possibly, among automobile companies, the reduction in the cost of cars may not be taken into consideration, but it is different where there are public-utility corporations, and we govern them by commissions because they are natural monopolies. Suppose, for instance, on the 1st of January, 1930, a rate were fixed for an electric power company and this tax of 3 per cent were imposed, and they should apply to a utility commission to raise their rate so as to include the 3 per cent, and the commission on the hearing should find that since that rate was established, January 1, 1930, their costs had been reduced 30 per cent, due to changes in conditions since January 1, 1930, which would offset the amount of the tax of 3 per cent. Would there be any ground for the commission raising the rates?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think not, and I thank the Senator. It seems to me he has brought out an important point for consideration.

If we look up the statistics—and I do not have them here at my desk—it will be found to be true that the great electric-power companies have not felt the depression. Their income in 1930 was greater than before. In 1931 it was about the same, as I remember, as in 1930, or perhaps in 1931 it was a little greater than in 1930, and was the same in the two preceding years.

They have lost some customers. As I remember it—and I am speaking entirely from memory—their earnings amounted to 6 per cent in localities where most of their customers were engaged in industry and using current for power purposes. But they have increased their income from domestic and commercial sources. In other words, they are dealing in something which must go into every business house and into every home, and the increase has more than offset the decrease.

In a case like that suggested by the Senator from Nevada the probabilities are that the company would fail to get an increase on its own showing, because the cost of production of electricity has decreased very materially. The expenses for material and for labor, like the expenses of all companies engaged in business, have decreased, but the consumers are more numerous. They have more than made up what loss they had in the industrial field by the increased business they have had in the domestic and the commercial field, taking into consideration the decrease in the cost of production.

On their own showing, therefore, they would fall down, and the commission would say, "Your cost of production has decreased a great deal more than this tax would increase it," and they would not be able to get the increase.

I only rose to call attention to the fact that we are about to vote upon the same amendment we voted on before, with slight changes, and it seems to me the reasons which impelled any Senator to vote against the first substitute offered ought, for equal reasons, and for the same logical reasons, induce him to vote in the negative on this amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I would like to say a word first on the proposition laid down by the Senator from Kentucky to the effect that every tax is passed on to the consumer. If that were so, I could not quite understand why the great, powerful, wealthy interests of this country would oppose an income tax. If they could just shunt it off onto the general public, why all this resistance to it? As a matter of fact—and I defer, of course, to the judgment of the Senator from Kentucky—I think the writers on taxation generally agree that there are many taxes which are not passed on to the consumer. Take the farming industry, for instance. A tax is imposed upon farmers, but how is the farmer to pass on to the consumer what he has to pay in taxes?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. The farmer is one of the ultimate consumers, he is one of the last men. He can not pass the tax on at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly he can not; but there are other ultimate consumers besides the farmer.

Mr. LOGAN. I know; but when it gets to the big income-tax payers, I suppose they have a little conscience, and that is what troubles them. Probably the reason why they resist it is because it would be troublesome to pass it on. But they will find some way, if they get good enough lawyers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is rather beside the question, because just how successfully the power companies could pass on the tax suggested by the Senator from Nebraska is a debatable question.

I rose particularly to give some further information concerning the financial situation of the companies which would be affected by this particular tax, a subject to which I addressed myself a while ago.

I have before me a copy of the Electrical World for January 2, 1932, which contains a summary from the reports of a large number of electric-power companies for the year 1931 as compared with 1930. These statistics will be of interest, I am sure.

Some of the companies lost and some of them made; that is to say, some of them had less income during 1931 than in 1930, others of them had very much more income, and, as stated heretofore, the companies finding their returns smaller are those deriving a greater portion of their profits from energy used in industry.

The Birmingham Electric Co. for the year ended October 31, 1931, had a decrease of 11 per cent in gross earnings and of 11 per cent in its net earnings. Nevertheless, it had a net profit during that year of $2,612,937.

The Carolina Power & Light Co. had a gross return of 8 per cent more in 1931 than in 1930. Its net returns were 1 per cent less. Nevertheless, it had a net income of $,998,507. I regret that the Senator from North Carolina, who did not give us his support on the last amendment, is not in the Chamber. That is to say, that company, operating down there, had a net profit last year of but $5,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, do the Senator's figures show what percentage of the gross the net is?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; the gross earnings of that company in 1931 were $9,654,195, as against $8,949,747 in 1930. It had a greater gross return but a slightly less net return.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator restate, for my information, the gross and net for one year so I can see the relationship?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The gross for 1931 was $9,654,195, and the net was $4,940,901, just about one-half. For 1930, the proportion was very much the same.

The Houston Light & Power Co., for the same year, suffered a loss in its gross return of 3 per cent, but its net returns were better by 8 per cent during 1930 than in 1931.

The Memphis Light & Power Co. improved its situation in both respects. It had a gross income of 4 per cent more in 1931 than in 1930, and a net income of 5 per cent more in 1931 than in 1930.

The Montana Power Co. suffered a loss of its gross income of 17 per cent and a loss in its net earnings of 19 per cent, easily explainable, because the chief sources of revenue to the Montana Power Co. are the great copper mines at Butte, which have been practically shut down due to the deplorable condition that now prevails in that enterprising city. Nevertheless, the Montana Power Co. still had a net income of $6,510,017.

The Northwestern Electric Co. suffered a loss of 3 per cent in its gross income, but its net income increased 1 per cent.

The Pacific Power & Light Co. was exceedingly fortunate. It increased its gross earnings by 6 per cent and its net earnings by 2 per cent.

The most fortunate company in the list is the Pennsylvania Power & Light Co., the figures concerning which will be of interest, I have no doubt, to the Senator from that State. The Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. had an improvement in its gross earnings in 1931 of 12 per cent over its earnings for 1930 and an increase of 12 per cent in its net earnings for 1931 over 1930.

May I say to the Senator from Kentucky that the Public Service Commission of the State of Pennsylvania increased the rates of that power company? Its total gross earnings for 1930 were $30,880,068 and its net was $16,692,631. For 1931 its gross was $34,434,853 and for 1931 it was $17,614,614.

The Southern California Edison Co. suffered a loss in both gross and net income, eight-tenths of 1 per cent in its gross and 3.1 per cent in its net.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In reporting the net, is that the operating net or does it include capital charges?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would not think it included capital charges.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is just the operating net?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should think so, although the information is not given here. It is just given in gross and net.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. REED. I think that must be net operating income before capital charges.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me understand what the Senator means by capital charges.

Mr. REED. I mean interest on bonds——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, I can not think so.

Mr. REED. I do not believe that interest on bonds has been deducted before arriving at that net income.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know of any institution that would report its net earnings without deducting its interest charges.

Mr. REED. I can tell the Senator of many, because the Interstate Commerce Commission requires all railways to report their income in just that fashion. First they report net operating income and then from that they deduct their capital charges, and that shows their net profits. These companies, or many of them, and I think that includes the Pennsylvania Power & Light Co., follow the same accounting practices. That is a great hydroelectric development. They have built enormous works on the Susquehanna River. The interest charge on that investment is very heavy as in all hydroelectric plants. A steam plant can be built comparatively cheaply, but the operating cost is high. The hydroelectric plants have a low operating cost, but a very high capital-carrying charge.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not possibly think that these companies would put out any such deceptive information as that.

Mr. REED. But every railway does it, as I told the Senator.

Mr. HOWELL. Not when they are trying to sell bonds. They would not dare put it out in that fashion.

Mr. REED. That is the form of accounting required by the Interstate Commerce Commission which they have to follow.

Mr. HOWELL. I am talking about when they sell bonds.

Mr. LOGAN. The Interstate Commerce Commission regards the net operating income as quite different from the net earnings.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They may have earnings quite aside from their net operating income.

Mr. REED. Surely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This is net earnings from all sources.

Mr. REED. I must respectfully doubt whether that is after deduction of bond interest.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Anyway it appears from this statement, as well as information heretofore given, that these companies are in a fairly prosperous state and can easily bear the tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute of the Senator from Pennsylvania for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, experts of the Treasury Department and some lawyers of the Senate are in doubt as to what would result under section (c) of the proposed amendment, which reads:

> No tax shall be imposed under this section upon any payment received for electrical energy or gas furnished the United States or to any State or Territory or political subdivision thereof or the District of Columbia.

I want to make it perfectly clear that this tax shall not be applied to electricity sold to a municipally owned water plant or a municipally owned electric-light plant or a municipally owned street-railway plant. Therefore I move to insert at the end of subsection (c), following the words "District of Columbia," the following proviso:

> Provided, That this tax shall not apply to a vendor selling to a municipally owned water or street-railway plant.

Mr. REED. I am glad to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania modifies his amendment by accepting the proposal of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, the modification offered by the Senator from Michigan relates to a point I had in mind when the Senator from Michigan took the floor. For instance, in my State in identical territory a municipal plant and a private plant operate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DALE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. This amendment would not affect that case. A municipal plant selling current to its domestic customers would have to account for the tax. This would merely take care of the sales of current to a municipally owned water company or a municipally owned street-railway company. It would not apply to a municipally owned electric-light company which was selling to private consumers.

Mr. DALE. In all the discussion that condition has not been referred to at all. If there is any way in the world to place this tax on the company I would like to do it. The only question that has been discussed is how to place the tax on the company and not place it on the consumer; but something much more unfair than that would be to tax one company 3 per cent and another company nothing, though operating in the same territory, and thus give one company an advantage of 3 per cent over the other one.

Mr. REED. I quite agree with the Senator. Under the Howell amendment the municipally owned company, as I understand it, would pay no tax while its competitor, the privately owned company, would have to pay a tax.

Mr. DALE. That is my understanding.

Mr. REED. Under the substitute which I have offered both companies would pay the tax.

Mr. DALE. That is, under the substitute offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. DALE. I thought from what the Senator from Michigan proposed that it would send the tax back to the consumer, just as it would have been done under the previous proposal.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, where the city of Detroit, for instance, owns a water plant and a street-railway plant, I am proposing that current sold to them shall not be taxed. It has nothing to do with the case the Senator from Vermont has in mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute of the Senator from Pennsylvania as modified.

Mr. HOWEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Jones	Schall

Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The yeas and nays have been demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. I understand that if the junior Senator from Virginia were present he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I have been unable to obtain a transfer, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who is necessarily absent. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce that on this question the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. If present, the Senator from Colorado would vote "yea," and the Senator from Iowa would vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate as a delegate in attendance upon the Geneva arms conference.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—35

Austin	Carey	Dickinson	Hale

NOT VOTING—14

Bingham	Glenn	Long	Waterman
Brookhart	Jones	Morrison	Watson
George	La Follette	Smith
Glass	Lewis	Swanson

So Mr. REED'S amendment, as modified, in the nature of a substitute for Mr. HOWELL'S amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think we are entitled to have a roll call on this question. Some of us have been in favor of a tax on electric power but preferred to follow the recommendations of the Treasury as to the manner of levying the tax. I want to vote for this proposed tax in order to raise the necessary revenue to balance the Budget, though the Finance Committee favored a different form of levying the tax. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, before the amendment is voted on, and so as to assure the Government of the income required in order to balance the Budget, I move to strike out of the amendment, in line 4, the words "payable from net income but not otherwise."

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator explain the purpose of the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska provides—

> There is hereby imposed upon energy sold by privately owned operating electrical power companies a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the price for which so sold—

Then come the words—> payable from net income but not otherwise.

I want to point out that that is the only instance in the case of any of the excise taxes where there is a provision that the tax shall be paid only if the companies have a net income. So if we want to assure an income to balance the Budget, we should eliminate the words "payable from net income but not otherwise."

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will say that I inserted those words at the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Michigan, and I think they ought to be in the amendment. I concluded after I had listened to his argument that it was proper to put them in.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, when the Senator proposed this amendment and sent it to the Finance Committee before we had passed on any excise taxes, I agreed with him at that time because we had not agreed upon any excise taxes and my hope was that we would rely upon income taxes; but having adopted the excise taxes, in connection with none of which is there a provision that the tax shall be paid only when there is a profit, I do not see why the power companies should be given preference and only be required to pay the tax if they have a net income. So I move that the words indicated be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, just a moment. Those words have been incorporated in the amendment so that if a company has not a profit it will not have to pay. I thought that was equitable and right.

Mr. COUZENS. But, Mr. President, there is no such provision in the case of any other manufacturer; the manufacturer of all other commodities upon which excise taxes are levied under this bill pays the tax without any provision that it shall be paid only in case there is a net income; and I do not see why the power companies should be treated differently.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have been in a committee meeting all day long and have not heard this amendment discussed at all. I should like to ask one or two questions concerning it before I vote, although my general pair is not here and is opposed to it and I shall probably not be able to vote, anyway. Nevertheless, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Pennsylvania how much it is estimated this amendment will yield?

Mr. SMOOT. About $51,000,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I ask the Senator also whether there is going to be any difficulty in collecting the tax, due to the fact that most of the States have public utility commissions that regulate the rates so that the companies will not be able to change their rates?

Mr. SMOOT. That is a question which I do not believe anybody could answer offhand. The Senator from Nebraska, however, thinks that the proposed tax will raise $51,000,000 even under the conditions existing to-day and just now referred to by the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, as amended. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." Therefore, as I intend to vote the same way, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who is necessarily detained from the Senate. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who has been called from the Chamber. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is absent from the Chamber. Not knowing how he would vote, I am compelled to withhold my vote; but if at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLENN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is necessarily absent, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. If present, the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] are necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent from the city, in attendance upon the disarmament conference in Geneva.

The result was announced—yeas 61, nays 19, as follows:

So Mr. HOWELL'S amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment imposing a tax on gasoline.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Utah offers the following amendment:

On page 257, after line 11, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. —. TAX ON GASOLINE

"(a) There is hereby imposed on gasoline sold by the importer thereof or by a producer of gasoline, a tax of 1 cent a gallon, except that under regulations prescribed by the commission, with the approval of the Secretary, the tax shall not apply in the case of sales to a producer of gasoline.

"(b) If a producer or importer uses (otherwise than in the production of gasoline) gasoline sold to him free of tax, or produced or imported by him, such use shall for the purposes of this title be considered a sale.

"(c) As used in this section—

"(1) The term 'producer' includes a refiner, compounder, or blender, and a dealer selling gasoline exclusively to producers of gasoline, as well as a producer.

"(2) The term 'gasoline' means gasoline, benzol, and any other liquid the chief use of which is as a fuel for the propulsion of motor vehicles, motor boats, or airplanes."

On page 264, line 16, after "etc.," insert a comma and the following: "or after June 30, 1933, in the case of articles taxable under section —, relating to the tax on gasoline."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate will notice that this tax is imposed for one year only, and the tax of 1 cent per gallon will raise a revenue of at least $150,000,000.

This tax is imposed in order that the Budget may be balanced. The committee did not know of any other way to raise sufficient revenue to balance the Budget. That seems to be the demand not only of the Senators but of all the country.

While we disliked to resort to this tax, we thought it was about the only means by which we could raise the necessary amount of money while doing as little harm as possible to business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I realize the desperate importance of the situation which confronted the Finance Committee, and which now confronts the Senate. Certainly I am one of those who are keenly anxious that this bill shall be completed, and, so far as the Senate is concerned, that the Budget shall be balanced, before adjournment to-night. Certainly I do not propose to raise any specious objection to any proposition which seems to be unavoidable in this connection.

On the other hand, I should feel that I was not entitled to occupy the particular seat I do occupy in the Senate if I did not bring to the Senate's attention some of the collateral facts that are involved in this decision.

I have in mind the fact that when this bill goes to conference there will be before the conferees various alternative sources of revenue. I am referring to those sources of revenue which the House has put in the bill, and the Senate thus far has declined to accept. I am referring to those sources of revenue which the Senate has put in the bill and which the House thus far has not had an opportunity to survey. What I am saying is that the ultimate choice in making up this final two hundred-odd million dollars will rest with the conferees as between these alternative sources of revenue.

Therefore, what I am saying is addressed not only to the Senate in respect of the immediate decision which it must make, but I am saying it also in respect of the decision which the conferees ultimately must make in the event that the Senate approves the pending proposal.

Mr. President, in the message conveyed to the Senate to-day by the President of the United States he very appropriately put all emphasis upon the welfare of the Nation as the paramount consideration to be consulted in this emergent hour. It is in respect to the welfare of the Nation, and not in respect to the welfare of any individual industry, that I make the following brief statement:

I want to repeat that the key industry of the United States to-day is the automotive industry. I want to repeat that the automotive industry led this Nation out of a depression within the past decade, and that the automotive industry to-day is the one and only industry in the land which has dared on a large scale to plan to lead the country out of this present depression. I submit again to the Senate, not in behalf of the automotive industry but in behalf of the common welfare to which we are asked to dedicate ourselves, that it is a very serious matter when the Government proposes to put hobbles upon the one key industry which is proposing to "Forward, march!"

Whenever the Treasury Department for the last several years has sought revenue, apparently it has always turned first in its thoughts to the automotive industry. Apparently, in the formation of the pending revenue bill, the first and the last thought always has been to approach automotion with the levies which we are to make. This bill already carries within it a special discriminatory tax upon passenger cars. It already carries within it a special discriminatory tax upon automobile trucks. It already carries a special discriminatory tax upon automobile accessories. It already carries a special discriminatory tax upon automobile tires and tubes. It already carries a special discriminatory tax upon lubricating oil.

Mr. President, though this industry be a giant, is there not a point at which even the giant can not longer carry the load?

Not only that, but speaking again of the common welfare, which is the sole consideration—and I emphasize it—the sole consideration which is entitled to be canvassed in such an hour as this, speaking again of the common welfare, I remind the Senate that every State in the Union is depending upon taxes upon gasoline for a large measure of its current revenues to-day, and it becomes an exceedingly serious thing, from the standpoint of the States themselves, when the Federal Government proposes now to invade this field to add to the gasoline-tax burden. I say it becomes a serious thing, not only through its discouragement to automotion but through the pyramiding levy which is put upon this one key commodity. I say there is a point at which it is unsafe further to go in the name of the common welfare.

I regret exceedingly that the Finance Committee could find no other tax target in this final hour, no other target except this tax patriot, which already is carrying more of the tax load than any other single industry or activity within the common life of the American people.

I think it is utterly unfortunate that the final necessity should bring us face to face with a levy which discourages the economic stimulus which this great industry has dared to plan to inject into the industrial life of the American people.

We confront not only the responsibility to balance the Federal Budget, Mr. President, we confront equally a collateral responsibility, and that is the responsibility to help our citizenship balance its own budget, and that citizenship, to the tune of 4,000,000 workmen, directly and indirectly, is dependent upon this particular industry.

Up and down the Nation collateral business is more intimately interwoven and interlinked with this particular industry than with any other in the land. In other words, we have picked out the key spot where hope ought to thrive, and we have chosen it once more for another and final discrimination.

If there is no alternative, I have nothing more to say, but if there is an alternative, Mr. President, I submit that providing the Senate insists upon proceeding in this channel, when the conference undertakes to canvass this situation, it should give prayerful thought to the problem, not of the industrial welfare of the automobile business but of the common welfare of the American people and the common tax welfare of the States of this Union, as both of those contemplations are inextricably linked with the tax upon gasoline.

Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Utah one question. I would be the last to propose at any such time as this any alternative which might be even remotely construed as being a subterfuge by way of doing this essential thing of balancing the Budget. But the Senator knows that for many weeks I have held the view that the capital expenditures of the Government, as represented within the pending bill—I am not referring to any additional expenditures; I am referring to those which are inescapable within the current Budget—the Senator knows that I have felt that in analogy with the method on which private business would operate these permanent improvements should be lifted out of current Budget and funded over a period of years.

May I ask the Senator from Utah, the chairman of the Finance Committee, this question? If the Senate puts all of these taxes into this bill, in other words, completes a bill which has within it the total sum which the Treasury seeks by way of balancing the Budget, would he think there was any danger of misconstruction if for the purpose of giving the conferees further latitude when they consider the whole problem, in addition the conferees were to have within this bill a further amendment dealing with the power to fund these permanent improvements? I submit that question to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the first place, I think there would be a question of putting that amendment upon this bill. I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator and say that if there is to be any difference between the estimates and the amount raised, I am fearful the bill would fall short rather than go over. I say that because of the condition of business to-day, and I can not see any immediate change in view. It seems to me that the only thing which will bring confidence to the industries and the people of the United States is for us to be absolutely sure that the Budget will be provided for in full.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. That is fundamental, and I think the country agrees with that position.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that is true; but I am suggesting that after that is all done, would there then be any danger if, in addition to that, we provided the conferees with an amendment in this bill so that in their ultimate, mature deliberation, if they saw fit to resort to it, they might have the opportunity of considering that alternative in connection with the final conference report?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what effect that would have upon the situation as it exists to-day. I would not want to put a thing into the bill that could be construed by the press, or the business men of the country, or the business men of the world as an indication that we were going to impose a greater burden upon the taxpayer of the country. There is many an item of taxation in the bill which I did not like to vote for, and I know the same applies to the Senator from Michigan. I know that the automobile industry, just as the Senator has said—one which employs men by the thousands and tens of thousands—is, I was going to say, the very backbone of the industries of this country, and that is one of the industries we felt we were compelled to hit hard, because it is one from which we could get the money. I doubt the wisdom of putting this amendment into the bill. I would rather undertake what the Senator desires to accomplish by a special bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is that possibility.

Mr. SMOOT. I would rather undertake it through a special bill than to have the amendment in this bill at this particular time.

I can not say whether I would support the amendment or not until I see what it is; but I do want to say to the Senator that I think that at this particular time, under the conditions existing not only in our own country but all over the world, we should give very serious consideration to his suggestion before we even think of putting it into this bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it is that phase of the matter which gives me pause, and is responsible solely for the fact that I do not submit the precise amendment which I have been defining. I have asked numerous Senators, including at least one who is recognized pretty generally as a dependable authority, as to whether there would be any subterfuge in the balancing of the Budget through the inclusion of this recourse, and the answer almost universally has been that the recourse is justified, and that it would not be a subterfuge. On the other hand, I submitted the same inquiry to the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and found that his reaction was different. I have now submitted it to the Senator from Utah, and I find that his reaction is different. I would infinitely prefer to proceed through independent legislation, if it subsequently develops that it can be done, than to leave any possible shadow at this final moment upon this thoroughly heroic yet ruthless thing which we are called upon to do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. REED. We all know that in commercial business there is nothing unsound about treating permanent construction as a capital investment and not expecting to pay for it out of the earnings of the particular year in which it is built. But for nearly a century and a half the United States Government has followed a contrary policy, and when the Senator submitted his suggestion to me I saw the force of his argument, but I apprehended that it would arouse suspicion. If, in order to balance our Budget, we adopted a totally new system of accounting, it would arouse suspicion, just as certain phases of the British budget-balancing process aroused cynical criticism at the time they were made.

We do not want to leave this matter in doubt. We do not want to allow any skeptic to sneer at what we are doing here. We do not want anybody to say that we are balancing our Budget only by the suppression of items which ever since this Government was created have been put in as ordinary expenses. It is for that reason, and that only, that I took the position I did take.

I want to say in closing that I think the Senator from Michigan in the attitude he is taking displays a very patriotic, broad-minded, generous spirit.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I realize that the gasoline tax is one of the most oppressive taxes to be found in the bill. I did not vote for it in the committee because I was hopeful that we might be able to find something else to replace it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I thought I had made it plain that personal wishes have nothing to do with my attitude. Neither has any personal interest for any particular State or any particular industry anything to do with my attitude. I am concerned chiefly because I fear that any handicap to the one and only courageous industry in the United States which is capable of serving in this emergency in a large way is a doubtful, exceedingly doubtful, public policy.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand, it is estimated that under the Connally amendment there will be raised about $70,000,000 more than would have been raised by the bill as it was last night. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is estimated to raise another $55,000,000. That would make $125,000,000. Based on last year's consumption of gasoline, a 1-cent tax on gasoline would raise $165,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. That would be correct, provided there was as much gasoline used as was used two years ago. It is estimated that it would not raise more than $150,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I want to bring out is that it is estimated that $150,000,000 would come from the gasoline tax, $55,000,000 from the Howell amendment, and $70,000,000 from the Connally amendment, making all together about $275,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it would be $275,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, let me conclude what I have to say. I am going to withhold any amendment respecting the funding of permanent improvements embraced within the existing Budget, although I think that is a perfectly legitimate method of procedure so long as we confine ourselves to public improvements within the already existing authorized Budget of the Government. But I shall hope that if upon mature deliberation it develops that an alternative of that nature is preferable, it may ultimately have consideration on its own independent merits at the proper time.

I recur then to the basic proposition which I submitted to the Senate. I can not myself recommend any such utterly indefensible discriminative burden as this finally pyramids upon automotion in the United States, but if the Senate concludes that it must proceed in this direction, I am particularly addressing myself to the ultimate conference, where an alternative choice will lie between various sources of revenue, and I am saying that there will be the only forum where any deliberative consideration has been given to this proposition, because it is brought into the Finance Committee and out of it and onto the floor of the Senate and into the bill all within a span of less than eight hours, without any adequate survey as to its possibility or its repercussions and without the consideration which ought to precede any such fundamental change in the tax system of the United States.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I opposed the tariff of 2½ cents on gasoline because I felt confident that if that tariff provision operated as contemplated by the proponents of the measure, it would result in a substantial increase in the price of gasoline and that the burden would most certainly be imposed on the consumers of gasoline for the benefit of the oil companies. For the same reason that I opposed that tariff which contemplated bringing a larger price at least to the producers of gasoline, I am going to oppose the proposal now to add an additional 1-cent tax under the provisions of the amendment directly upon gasoline. I do not know of any product of common use that is more heavily burdened with taxation to-day than is the automobile. I know of no class of people that have imposed upon them a greater tax burden for a particular convenience or utility than that which the law of to-day in the States, and now it will be also the law of the Nation, imposes upon those who use automobiles.

There are approximately 26,000,000 automobiles in the country. Every time we impose a tax on automobiles we necessarily burden those who are using them. If we keep on, we will tax the industry and the people to death. I did not favor a general sales tax, but if the price of gasoline is increased 2½ cents a gallon on account of the tariff—which, by the way, was supported by my friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] who pleads so earnestly now in behalf of the automobile industry—and if there be added a direct tax of 1 cent additional under this amendment, then there will have been a tax burden imposed upon the average citizen of the United States that would far exceed a general sales tax of 1¾ or 2 per cent.

To impose a sales tax of 2 per cent on all articles and commodities other than food and clothing and medicine that the average person uses who has an automobile in this country would not amount to more than $4 or $5 a year. That is all it would cost him. We have seen proper to adopt that proposal. I was among those who voted against it. Yet if we impose a tax of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline, we will increase the expenditures of the average citizen in the United States far more than it would if we had imposed the general sales tax upon him. He has not only to contend with the 1 cent per gallon Federal tax if the amendment is adopted, but the States have gasoline taxes ranging from 3 to 7 cents a gallon, and he has to contend with those. The price of the automobile tag has been increased in practically all the States.

This measure imposes a tax of 3 per cent upon the purchase of the automobile, a tax of 2 per cent upon the tires and tubes and accessories, and everything that he uses if he is the possessor of an automobile. And yet, because it is rather easily imposed and easily collected, we would impose this additional burden. I think the people of my State are going to have to contribute sufficient under the other provisions of the measure without having an additional burden of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 a year imposed upon them in the way of a Federal gasoline tax.

I hope the amendment will be defeated, and that some other source of revenue may be found. We just voted on a proposal here a few moments ago, and I voted in favor of it with some hesitancy, which, in all probability, will increase the cost of the gas and electricity consumed in the average household. That tax, I fear, is going to reach the people of the country. Talk about exempting such necessities as food and clothing; I would like to know where there are greater necessities than gas with which to prepare food and heat with which to warm and make comfortable human beings during the wintertime and electricity to light their homes. Yet we have just adopted an amendment providing for a 3 per cent tax upon the purchases of gas and electricity to be used in the homes. Of course, it is stated that it shall come from the gross receipts of the company, but it may be the greater part of that tax will be passed on directly to the consumer.

There are not many States in the Union where the public service commission, passing upon the question, will be convinced by the power companies that they are entitled to increase their rates on account of the tax. If that be true, we will again reach directly the consumer and impose a tax which will be no easier for him to pay than if we had a general sales tax of 1¾ or 2 per cent.

I think we are imposing too much upon the people in the way of taxes upon necessities, upon commodities and articles of general consumption, and that we should not increase the tax burden by means of a 1 cent per gallon tax on gasoline, which will mean an increase under this particular measure of 3½ cents a gallon tax upon all the gasoline produced in the country if the tariff provision operates as it was contemplated to operate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, may I ask my colleague if he will yield for me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to his colleague for that purpose?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I need not say in the closing moments of this debate that I share the conviction of Senators who think that our first duty is to balance the income and expenditures of the Government. We can not contemplate with composure the failure to balance the Budget. The consequences of failure but add to existing disaster. My views upon this point have been expressed in a communication to a constituent which I ask leave to print in the RECORD at this point.

The communication referred is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D. C., April 30, 1932.

Hon. C. F. COLCORD,
Colcord Building, Oklahoma City, Okla.

MY DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

I agree with you that we ought to reduce the expenses of the Government, including a cut in our own salaries, this latter for an example more than for any substantial saving that would be effected.

I say this because our expenses during the last fiscal year, for instance, were about $4,000,000,000. One billion of that represented service on our war debts—interest and sinking fund. An additional billion represented pensions and other payments to the veterans of our various wars. Indeed, the aggregate was $1,120,000,000 and a little more.

The Military and Naval Establishments account for nearly $800,000,000 more.

Our civil establishments, representing the real work of the Government, cost only five hundred and four million a year. That is where the pruning hook will have to be applied, and if we cut it down 10 per cent or 11 per cent, as is proposed, it would save enough to run our Government a little less than one week. The Government costs $13,000,000 a day, and we are running about $8,000,000 a day behind.

That is the point that distresses me most. We must balance the Budget, and if we do not the evils of this day, grievous and galling as they are, may hereafter be referred to as "the good old days."

If we do not balance the Budget the credit of the Government will be impaired. That means that the United States bonds will decline in price, even in spite of the fact that they are tax exempt. The man in the street may say that he has no United States bonds and therefore he is not concerned with the price. When United States bonds go down other bonds will fall. The man in the street may say that he has no bonds of any kind and is therefore not concerned.

When bonds go down stocks go down—in times like these. The man in the street may say that he has neither bonds nor stocks, and he is still unconcerned.

But when bonds and stocks (securities) go down, commodities go down, corn and cotton go down. Cotton went off $2 yesterday, trading securities. * * *

The pity of it is, everybody wants everything at the hands of the Government. I am one magician who has little faith in his own magic. In other words, I do not believe in "the fairies," but many do. And they demand that the Government work miracles and relieve everybody's distress.

The truth is, we are in large measure seeking remedies for the irremediable. It is no more possible for Congress or for this Government to escape the economic consequences of the war or to counteract them by law alone than it would be possible by passing a resolution to raise the dead that sleep in France. I have been trying to work out ways and means to change the conditions and to counteract the causes which have brought these disastrous times upon us. I am sure that you will in large measure agree with me on many of these points. * * *

Let me say again that I value your suggestions and I am glad you wrote me. I shall think it hard of you if you do not write again one of these days.

Your friend, truly,

T. P. GORE.

Mr. President, my desire to balance the Budget has been manifest in my votes. On every roll call excepting two I have voted with the Committee on Finance. I have voted for taxes that I did not favor. I would not have anyone think that I favored these nuisance taxes upon their merits or that I favored them per se. Business is prostrate, and when I have voted to visit additional burdens upon the prostrate industries of this country I have felt a good deal as if I were bleeding an anemic or as if I were flogging a wounded soldier upon the field of battle. I have voted for these nuisance taxes. They have but one virtue; they are nuisance taxes; those upon whom they are visited are highly organized; they are sensitive, class conscious, tax-conscious. They will get rid of these taxes when the present exigency shall have passed.

Mr. President, we witnessed a strange spectacle in this Chamber at high noon to-day. We heard the President of the United States recommend that Congress appropriate $300,000,000 to aid the sovereign States of this Union in making provision for their distressed citizens. The President recommended that we appropriate $300,000,000 for the several States. In order to impress Senators, I ask that one sentence may be read from this day's address of the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

> In order, however, that there may be no failure on the part of any State to meet its obligation in this direction I have, after consultation with some of the party leaders on both sides, favored authorization to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan up to $300,000,000 to State governments where they are unable to finance themselves in provision of relief to distress.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the United States of America is asked to appropriate out of its Treasury $300,000,000 to be distributed among the sovereign States of this great Republic. What does that mean? That States in this country are on the verge of insolvency; that sovereign States are upon the edge of bankruptcy; that sovereign States are unable to balance their budgets; are unable to feed the hungry within their borders. I may say that on one day 40,000 farms were sold for taxes in Mississippi—my native State—I say this not to reflect upon her, for I love every blade of her grass; I love every grain of her sands; and press reports declared that Michigan was in extremes almost as serious as was Mississippi.

I repeat, there is hardly a State in this Union that is not having difficulty to balance its own budget and comes here, I might almost say, in the character of a suppliant. Yet within 30 minutes after we are advised to appropriate $300,000,000 for these prostrate States the Finance Committee of the United States Senate lays its heavy hand upon the one resource of taxation and revenue which has heretofore been reserved to these sovereign States, the one resource which has always been held inviolate and has never been invaded by our National Government and its numberless tax-gatherers. The Finance Committee has advised and recommended that the Senate lay a tax of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline. That means a tax of $165,000,000.

The proposal to lay a manufacturers' sales tax contemplated only $325,000,000 on all the various and sundry articles and commodities that were to be included within the purview of that tax. And yet the Finance Committee advises the Senate to levy on one commodity alone a tax of $165,000,000, which is more than one-half of the aggregate revenue that would be raised from the general manufacturers' sales tax.

If this commodity had escaped taxation in the past, perhaps it could bear this load, perhaps it could stagger under such an unprecedented burden. I believe that no such tax, save on tobacco and liquors, was ever imposed by the National Government on any single article or commodity.

But, Senators, this proposed tax falls upon a commodity that is already overburdened with taxation. The several States of the Union in the aggregate now collect a tax on gasoline of $550,000,000 a year. Gasoline is doing its duty, is doing more than its bit, paying $550,000,000 a year into the famished treasuries of the several States; and yet, as if to heap Pelion upon Ossa, a surtax, so to speak, of $165,000,000 is to be laid by the hands of the National Government upon this overtaxed resource heretofore reserved exclusively for the States.

Can gasoline bear an additional tax of 1 cent per gallon? The taxes on gasoline range to-day, I believe, from 2 cents in the District of Columbia to 7 cents in Tennessee and Florida, and I understand that two of the States have imposed a tax of approximately 8 cents on gasoline. Can gasoline sustain an additional 1-cent-a-gallon tax? If so, it ought to be reserved to the States. Are we to raise $165,000,000, taking it away from the States' resources and then lend it back to the several States in the form of alms and in charity? Shall we plunder the States with one hand, plunder their resource of revenue and taxation, and with the other hand, with a generosity that is as unexampled as is this proposal, bestow that revenue upon the States that might as well have imposed the tax themselves?

Mr. President, if gasoline can stand 1 more cent per gallon, let New York add a cent to her tax. It would raise some $16,000,000, and would help New York to mend her budget.

In California, if gasoline can stand an additional tax, let California impose the tax. It would raise some $7,000,000, and would help California maintain her solvency and ward off bankruptcy.

If gasoline can stand another cent, let Texas lay that tax within her borders and raise $7,000,000 more.

I assume that in Florida it raises a million or more of revenue, and in Mississippi, where the treasury is yawning for additional revenue. Yet the Government of the United States proposes to lay this additional burden, to invade this State resource, to appropriate this source of revenue, and then, having collected the revenue, to turn it back to the States in order to relieve a distress which the Government itself had occasioned through this unwarranted taxation.

Mr. President, not only should this resource be left in the future, as in the past, with the several States, but this tax is imposed upon an industry that can ill sustain such a burden.

Senators, oil is taxed from the mouth of the well, where it comes out of the ground, until it is delivered in the tank of your automobile; and the aggregate of these taxes from the well to the automobile is a little more than $1 per barrel of crude oil. The average price of crude oil in the United States to-day is 92 cents a barrel. Oil is bearing a tax of a little more than 100 per cent. Is not that enough? Shall we single out one industry, already overtaxed, and lay upon it an additional burden of $165,000,000?

You say, "How can this be?" Mr. President, taking 41 of the leading oil companies in the United States, their reports for last year show that 9 made a profit, and that 32 sustained a loss. The 9 that realized profits were these: Standard of New Jersey; Standard of Indiana; Standard of California; Standard of Ohio; Standard of Kentucky; next the Humble, a subsidiary of the Standard of New Jersey; next the Atlantic Refining Co., formerly affiliated with the Standard; and two other companies, the Sun Co. and the Texas Corporation, not affiliated, so far as I know, with any of the Standard companies. Every other oil company on this list showed a loss. One concern showed a loss amounting to $23,000,000; and yet you intend to wring additional revenue from the remains of the dead! Is this wise fiscal policy?

I shall not comment on the fact that this is a tax on power. Of all taxes, the most unscientific, the most uneconomic, the most unjust, is a tax on power, because it begins at the very source of production, at the source of industrial activity, and it accumulates as it goes, gathers volume and velocity like the avalanche, becoming an increased burden at every stage of advancing production. I make no point of that, because I realize that these sacrifices must be made.

Senators, your own States are vitally affected by this proposed tax. It means that $165,000,000, if available at all, that ought to be available to the States, are taken and appropriated by the General Government. It means that your State must find some additional source of revenue, must find some additional resource where the tax gatherer can gather his tribute. It means that the people of your State, the taxpayers of your State, must see $165,000,000 of available resources withdrawn from their borders and that amount of potential revenues withdrawn from their treasuries and poured into the Treasury of the United States; and if it comes back at all, it comes back in the form of aid and assistance and charity handed out by the Federal Government.

Is there a Senator here who would not prefer to have his State make use of this resource, if it be available, and apply it to the needs and the requirements of his own Commonwealth?

I ask you, Senators, to keep hands off this resource, and keep it, if not sacred, at least dedicated to the States of the Union.

One additional remark, Mr. President.

In the House, bill 12353 has been introduced by Congressman RAINEY. It proposes an appropriation of a billion dollars for relief work of one description or another. I find that section 361 levies a tax of one-fourth of 1 cent per gallon on gasoline to pay the interest on the billion dollars of indebtedness to be created by this enactment. It appropriates a billion dollars and gently lays its hand upon gasoline to guarantee and to pay the interest on that vast bonded indebtedness.

Let me say one more word, Mr. President: Here lies the vice, the inherent vice and danger, in a general sales tax.

Fifteen years ago the States of this Union began to levy a tax upon gasoline—first a tax of 1 cent a gallon, then 2, then 3, then 4, then 5, then 6, then 7, now 8 is in sight. That is an inherent tendency in the sales tax—to grow. And I may say, Senators, that before the fiscal reforms of President Diaz in Mexico during the nineties, there were between the wheat in the field and the bread on the table 32 different taxes imposed upon the sale and transfer of that necessary of life—from the farm to the table!

I make no point of the fact that there are 4,000,000 automobiles on the farms of this country, but there are 1,000,000 tractors on our farms. This is a tax on tractors. There are 1,000,000 stationary engines on our farms. This is a tax on the farmer's power. This is a new burden—an added burden—on his shoulders.

This tax will stimulate the bootlegging of gasoline. Bootlegging is already a racket. In some communities a worse racket than the bootlegging of liquor. This tax will encourage that racket. It will cheat the State treasuries of revenue and will embarrass the honest dealer with lawless, with impossible, competition.

It is an almost unbroken rule throughout the country that where the tax rate is too high the tendency is to use less gasoline per car and to use fewer cars. There are only two States, Florida and Tennessee, in which a 7 cent tax is exacted; and Florida registered fewer cars in 1930 than in 1929. There are four States with a 6-cent tax, and in all of these—Arkansas, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina—fewer cars were registered in 1930 than in 1929. There are 10 States with a 5-cent tax, and in 7 of these fewer cars were registered in 1930 than in 1929. These 5-cent tax States which decreased their registration while maintaining so high a tax were Alabama, Kentucky, Louisiana, Montana, Oklahoma, and Virginia. There are 15 States which impose a 4-cent tax, and 6 of these had fewer registrations of cars in 1930 than in 1929. They are Nevada, Oregon, Ohio, Vermont, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

On the other hand, there are 15 States with tax rates of only 3 or 2 cents. In 11 of these the number of registered cars increased. The three exceptions were North Dakota and Iowa, where the agricultural depression furnished explanation; and Michigan, where the reduced operations of the great automobile manufacturing industries is the obvious reason.

To put it briefly, a survey of the entire country demonstrates beyond cavil that there is a point of maximum productiveness for this tax. Above 2 cents it tends to drive out the cars, to produce a lower consumption of gasoline per car, and to lessen the revenue that can be collected. Above 2 cents the tax presents at once a too attractive prize to the bootlegger and the crook, and a too onerous burden to the automobile owner.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read to the Senate a telegram from Harry H. Smith, secretary of the Midcontinent Oil and Gas Association, protesting against the proposed tax on gasoline and giving convincing reasons why such a tax would be most unfair to a prostrate industry. I approve all that he says in opposition to this tax. The tax on gasoline should be reserved for the States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TULSA, OKLA., May 31, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER:

We are just advised that Finance Committee has recommended Federal tax on gasoline and we urgently protest against the enactment of any such an unjust addition to the gasoline-tax burden already inflicted by the States. The tax is so high that bootleggers and evaders are destroying the legitimate industry and defrauding the people through tax evasion. Already consumption of gasoline is seriously reduced by the tax and the motorist is in rebellion against practice of following the line of least resistance by heaping additional taxes upon his hitherto willing shoulders. All elements in the Southwest join me in urging that you oppose this discriminatory tax. Are there not other commodities which could be included in a general manufacturers' sales tax and thus solve the problem?

HARRY H. SMITH,
Secretary Midcontinent Oil and Gas Association.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate just a moment. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee one or two questions to clarify the pending amendment.

The amendment proposes a tax of 1 cent per gallon upon imported and domestically produced gasoline. My question is this: If this amendment is adopted, the refiners of gasoline in America will pay 1 cent per gallon tax and the importers of gasoline will likewise pay 1 cent per gallon tax?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then if this amendment is adopted, and the existing amendment in the bill is retained, placing a tax of 2½ cents on imported gasoline, the total tax upon imported gasoline will be 3½ cents per gallon?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I wanted that made definitely clear.

I can not vote for the amendment; however, I feel obligated to suggest another way to raise the same amount of money.

I ask the chairman of the committee one or two questions to see whether or not my proposed substitute has a foundation, and I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. Is it not a fact that when Congress voted $500,000,000 from the Federal Treasury as the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation we thereby took such $500,000,000 of the taxpayers' money the same as we would take a like sum to build buildings, flood control, or irrigation works, or make any other public expenditures?

Mr. SMOOT. It was a drain upon the Treasury, just the same as any other appropriation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The $500,000,000 has been paid by the Treasury to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Therefore, it will be necessary for Congress to raise $500,000,000 by taxation to replace in the Treasury the $500,000,000 taken therefrom for the use of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Senator; that is not in the Budget. It was a direct authorization, and it is not in the Budget that is made up.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it is my contention that when the Congress appropriated that $500,000,000, we thereby placed that much additional burden upon the taxpayers of the United States. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. That was for the fiscal year 1932. This is for the fiscal year 1933.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Whether it is for 1932 or 1933 makes no difference whatever. The taxpayers must raise money to pay the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. My proposed substitute authorizes and directs the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to sell $150,000,000 of their debentures and take the money it receives from such sale and replace the $150,000,000 heretofore received from the Treasury, and if this is done the Budget will be balanced without the necessity of imposing this 1 cent per gallon tax on gasoline.

Mr. SMOOT. There is quite a demand on the part of some sections of the United States that the funds of that corporation be increased rather than decreased.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been at work now for several months. They have just completed making expenditures, in the form of loans, and have used up the first $500,000,000. A few days ago they sold their first debentures. The President on this day recommended that we raise the limit of the debentures to be issued by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from one and one-half billions to $3,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee, on page 257, after line 11, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and directed to sell, as provided by law, the sum of $150,000,000 of its debentures and when such sale is consummated said corporation is directed to replace with the Treasury said sum as a repayment to a portion of its capital stock.

Mr. President, that is a source of revenue. A few days ago the Treasury offered some debentures bearing a very nominal rate of interest for sale and they were oversubscribed, I think, five or six times. The Treasury has no trouble in selling its debentures and its short-term notes. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has no trouble in selling its debentures. We have already paid $500,000,000 to them from the Treasury. If they sell the debentures—and they can sell them—and thereby secure $150,000,000 and repay to the Treasury a part of the capital stock heretofore advanced, such an act would relieve the Congress of the necessity of raising this additional revenue.

If there is anything wrong with my reasoning I will yield to any Senator to point out such error.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. There is this difference: The Reconstruction Finance Corporation borrows its money only to lend it, not to spend it, whereas I understand the Senator is talking about selling some bonds in order that the proceeds may be actually spent, with no idea of any return.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. My proposal is simply to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to sell $150,000,000 of its debentures, and take the money received from such sale and repay a portion of the capital stock secured from the taxpayers of the United States. If that should be done, we would have outstanding $150,000,000 more of debentures of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but, at the same time, the Treasury would be minus only $350,000,000 as the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Is not that a fair statement of the proposition which I have submitted to the Senate?

Mr. WALCOTT. I think not quite, because the amount borrowed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation through the sale of its debentures, if paid over to the Treasury or any other concern, unless it were a loan, would increase the deficit of the United States by that much. That, of course, is the chief advantage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; it is not increasing the deficit at all, because all of its assets are for the purpose of lending, not spending.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. This amendment I have submitted would, in effect, be an amendment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. It would have the force and effect of limiting the capital stock to $350,000,000. As the law now stands, the capital stock is $500,000,000.

I do not desire to take the time of the Senate. I have offered this amendment as a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have not been able to follow the debate, but I would like to know whether anyone has presented to the Senate a list of the taxes now imposed by the several States upon gasoline.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for his question. I would like to reserve the right to print the information in the RECORD. I think I have it, although I am not certain.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to have that in the RECORD in connection with my question.

May I say to the senior Senator from Oklahoma that the imposition of a tax on gasoline seems to have been particularly within the domain of the several States.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Up to the present time it has been exclusively within the domain of the several States.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Within two weeks my own State has increased the tax on gasoline 1 cent a gallon for the purpose of assisting the municipalities of the State, which have found the burden of taking care of the welfare demands very onerous.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that my State has imposed a 1-cent tax upon gasoline for the assistance of those in distress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is exactly what my State has done, in addition to the tax it had previously imposed.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, what is the total tax Massachusetts imposes?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is now 5 cents.

Mr. SMITH. My State collects 6 cents a gallon on gasoline.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I understand that one of the Southern States collects 7 cents. This proposed tax would make the tax 8 cents upon every gallon of gasoline sold in that State.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In the Finance Committee room, when the committee was anxious to obtain revenue to balance the Budget, I suggested a graduated tax on lubricating oil, dependent upon the price, in the hope that we could meet this revenue demand in that manner, rather than by putting another tax on gasoline.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I would like to state in this connection that a number of the States dedicate the revenue derived from the gasoline tax to the construction and maintenance of their highways.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is so in my State.

Mr. GORE. I think that in one or more States specific pledge has been made to that effect.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They have gone further in my State. They have offered a portion of it to meet the general expenses of the State, and another cent tax for the purpose of relieving the welfare demands because of the emergency.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the tax on gasoline now is so high as to be an incentive to persons to secure gasoline from unauthorized sources and dispose of it without the payment of a tax. Throughout the country that is general to-day, so that the bootlegging of gasoline is rapidly becoming a racket.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Only the other day, in driving through the District here, or just outside of the District, I saw a tank wagon on the side of the road, and some people having the gasoline tanks of their cars filled with gasoline. I inquired what that meant, what the explanation was of a wagon of gasoline filling private cars. The reply was that they were "bootlegging," that there would not be any tax paid under those circumstances. It was said to me that that was very common.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That practice is very common right here in Washington. You can see on many isolated corners trucks with signs "Gasoline 12 cents—oil 15 cents."

It is charged that much of that gas escapes all tax.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator knows that under the levies by the States the tax is levied on the immediate distributors, while the tax proposed by the Finance Committee is to be collected at the refineries. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to get the Senator's observation as to what difference it makes as to whether we levy the tax upon the refiner rather than upon the distributing stations.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think it would be much easier collected if we levied the tax on the refineries.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the States, of course——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The States collect the tax at the distributing points.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As the chairman of the committee knows, I said in the committee that I would vote very reluctantly to support the committee, and I feel very strongly that we ought to leave this matter to the States. The States are terribly burdened, and they are limited almost to taxes upon real estate, and we know that real estate is terribly burdened. This is a field the States have taken, and it is producing very extensive revenues, so I dislike very much to have the Federal Government reach out and say, "We want to share in that tax also." I wish we could get something else to take its place.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, who is a member of the Committee on Finance, that I have offered an amendment as a substitute for the pending amendment, which in effect would postpone $150,000,000 of the present deficit through the sale of Reconstruction Finance Corporation debentures. The force and effect of my amendment would be to postpone the necessity of raising through taxation $150,000,000 this year. If this substitute should be agreed to, in place of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation having a capital stock of $500,000,000 in the form of Treasury money, they would have only $350,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I appreciate the Senator's proposal that there should be something substituted for this tax in case it is defeated in the Senate, and I think that what he has proposed is worthy of very careful and sympathetic consideration. I would not want to say offhand that I agree with his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Sheppard
Austin	Cutting	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bailey	Davis	Keyes	Shortridge
Bankhead	Dill	King	Smith

Copeland	Hull	Schall

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, may we have the substitute reported?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 257, after line 11, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] offers the following substitute:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and directed to sell, as provided by law, the sum of $150,000,000 of its debentures; and when such sale is consummated then said corporation is directed to replace with the Treasury said sum as a repayment of a portion of its capital stock.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the quorum call has brought into the Chamber a number of Senators who were not here when the Senator from Oklahoma explained his amendment. Will he be good enough to make a brief statement explanatory of it so those Senators may understand its purpose?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, we are trying to raise money to balance the Budget. We are trying to avoid a sales tax upon gasoline. Presuming that the amendment passes providing for a 1-cent tax on each gallon of gasoline, where are the folks to get the money to pay the 1-cent tax? Too many of them do not have it now. The banks will not loan it to them. In some sections money does not exist.

Now, we propose to put another 1-cent tax upon the sale of gasoline throughout the United States. Heretofore this source of revenue has been reserved to the States. We are trying to raise $150,000,000 to balance the Budget. As a substitute for the tax of 1 cent per gallon on gasoline I have proposed the authority and the direction to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to sell $150,000,000 of their $1,500,000,000 of debentures and, when the sale is made, take the $150,000,000 to the Treasury and replace the $150,000,000 that heretofore has been advanced as capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The force of my amendment is that it postpones the necessity of raising $150,000,000 by taxation for the next year. The second thing it does is to replace in the Treasury $150,000,000 that has been taken and placed in the treasury of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

If the Senate desires to reduce the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by $150,000,000 we can do it by agreeing to the substitute. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation can sell the bonds, can get the money, and can repay the Treasury. When the Treasury gets the $150,000,000 it will not be necessary to raise the money by a Federal tax on gasoline.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I knew the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was a Lord Chesterfield and Sir Roger de Coverly rolled into one, but his solicitude to-day for absent Senators transcends any act of politeness ever exhibited by any other person.

The Senator from Massachusetts observed that some Senator happened to be out of the Chamber at the time the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] made his speech, and thereupon requested the accommodating Senator from Oklahoma to repeat the speech. Do we make progress by having speeches repeated for the benefit of absent Senators?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. The yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]; but I am advised that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. GLENN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]; but I find I can transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I make that transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the general pair of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—8

Bulow	McGill	Nye	Thomas, Okla.
Gore	Norris	Sheppard	Trammell

NAYS—80

Ashurst	Couzens	Howell	Robinson, Ark.

NOT VOTING—8

Black	Broussard	Long	Swanson

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to the committee amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move to strike out the numeral "1" where it occurs in the amendment and to substitute "one-half of 1," so as to read "one-half of 1 cent per gallon."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. GORE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the second amendment. It is necessary to reconsider the vote whereby the former committee amendment was agreed to in order that the amendment may be considered. Without objection, the vote is reconsidered, and the Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 264, line 16, after "etc.," it is proposed to insert "or after June 30, 1933, in the case of articles taxable under section —, relating to taxes on gasoline."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I send to the desk an amendment which I propose on page 202, and ask that the clerk may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 201, after line 24, it is proposed to insert the following as a new subsection:

(c) In addition to the foregoing tax there is hereby imposed on the transfer of that portion of the value of the net estate which is represented by property held by the decedent at his death the income from which is exempt from income tax under the provisions of section 22 (b) (4) of this act, a tax at a per cent rate equal to one-half of that percentage which the tentative tax computed under subsection (a) (1) is of the net estate.

Also,

On page 203, line 14, strike out "tax" and insert in lieu thereof "taxes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, briefly the effect of the amendment is this: Assume that a man dies leaving an estate of $600,000, of which $100,000 is represented by tax-exempt securities; assume further, for the purpose of the illustration only, that the total tax without regard to the proposed amendment is $60,000—actually under the House bill it is $62,000—the average rate of tax will then be one-tenth, or 10 per cent. The amendment proposes to levy an additional tax at a per cent rate equal to one-half of that percentage which the tentative tax is of the net estate, or one-half of 10 per cent, or 5 per cent. The amount of the net estate represented by tax-exempt securities being $100,000, the additional tax will be 5 per cent of $100,000, or $5,000.

The purpose of this amendment, let me say, is to reach tax-exempt securities which are left by decedents in their estates.

Mr. CONNALLY. They are taxable now.

Mr. WHEELER. This is an additional tax on tax-exempt securities that have not paid a tax during the lifetime of the decedent.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment, because it is meritorious.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the amendment, and will let it go to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the appropriate place in the bill it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported from a country whose currency has depreciated on the day of exportation of such articles, except such articles as are not mined, grown, or manufactured in the United States, an excise tax of 1 per cent of the value thereof for each 1 per cent that the value of the currency of such country, as proclaimed by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with existing law, for the quarter in which the articles were exported, exceeds the value of the currency of such country on the day of importation, as certified by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as everyone knows, the currencies of several countries of the world are very much depreciated, and they are taking advantage of such depreciation to compete with their products in the markets of the United States. They are able to do so because they can produce at a very much reduced cost, even granting that otherwise costs were equal. This amendment is simply intended to equalize the prices of such articles at the point at which they were when laid down in this country prior to any depreciation of the currency of the country from which they come. That is the sole purpose of it. The amendment may not be worded in language that exactly brings about the purpose desired, but that can be dealt with in conference.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. May I suggest to the Senator from Washington that if we keep on doing some things here that we have been doing foreign countries will be levying tariffs against our depreciated currency.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this amendment is not intended as a tariff measure in any technical sense; it may be in the nature of a tariff, but in the practical sense it is not a tariff; it is simply an attempt, as I say, to equalize prices at the point at which they were before the currencies of foreign countries became depreciated; it is to put our people on substantially the same basis as they were a year or two ago in competition with foreign-produced articles. That is the sole purpose of it.

It means, I think, much to our people; it means much in the matter of revenue, and that is something we need. It is said that with the amendments which we have adopted the bill will balance our revenues without expenditures; that it will balance the Budget, to use a common expression; but I think we had better make sure that we have done that rather than have any doubt about it. It is estimated by those in responsible position but who are not prepared to give an official estimate to the Congress that the adoption of this amendment would raise revenue to the amount of from sixty to over a hundred million dollars. I think anybody can see that there will be considerable revenue derived in case the amendment should be adopted, by making good the currency depreciation which has taken place in foreign currencies as it affects the value of the imports which are sent to this country. Because of their depreciated currencies they are enabled to place their products in our market at a far lower rate than can any of the countries whose currency is at par or which is not depreciated. Everyone can see that.

While its effect may be protective in a way, the sole purpose of the amendment is to put the commodities produced by our people in the markets of the United States on a par with the products brought here from foreign countries whose money is depreciated. Is there any American citizen who wants to promote the welfare of our people and put them at least upon a par with the people of foreign countries, who is opposed to a proposition of that kind?

Briefly, that is the sole object of this amendment. It is not intended to do any more to the products of foreign countries than to put them, taking into consideration their depreciated currencies, on which their prices are based, on a par with prices on the basis of our currency, and then we are perfectly willing to take our chances in our own market with the people of foreign countries. I hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this amendment injects into the consideration of this bill a subject matter that is largely foreign to the purposes of the legislation just about to be passed.

If it is seriously to be contended for, the proposal of this amendment will greatly delay the final passage of this bill. No one can tell how much time will be required for the proper consideration of this proposal.

I regret that the Senator from Washington has proposed the amendment. If it is voted into the bill, a motion to reconsider will be made, and many Senators will discuss it at length.

Relying on the fairness of the Senate, on its readiness to respond to the necessities of the occasion and quickly to dispose of this bill without going into so large and so foreign a subject as this amendment involves, I conclude what I have to say with the expression of the hope that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not think that an amendment like the one introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] should be laid aside simply because certain people state that it is going to take too much time to consider it and that it will delay action on the bill. This is a very important matter. It is a matter which will give considerable revenue to the country.

In these days of depression, when 8,000,000 of our people are out of work, not even the most dyed-in-the-wool free trader would dare to suggest letting down the tariff walls and allowing the product of cheap foreign labor to flood our markets, shut down our industries, and further add to our list of unemployed. Yet that is precisely what, through no fault of ours, is happening to our industries through the depreciation of foreign currencies.

Great Britain, by going off the gold standard, has depreciated the pound by practically 25 per cent. The currencies of the Scandinavian countries, Spain, Japan, and most of South America have depreciated to an even greater extent.

Theoretically, when the currency of a country becomes depreciated, the cost of labor and raw material which go to make up the cost of production should go up to a nearly equal extent, so that the country gets no advantage from the depreciation of its currency in its foreign commerce. This was the contention of Mr. O'Brien, chairman of the Tariff Commission, in his testimony recently given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House; and his contention is probably borne out by past experience when a single country has gone off the gold basis and its currency has depreciated. In such a case, where such a country is dependent in large measure for its raw materials and its food supplies on other countries that are on the gold standard, its cost of production will inevitably go up. But in the present situation, where most of the countries in the world are either off the gold standard or suffering from a depreciation of their currencies, no such result follows. On the contrary, by buying from countries whose currency is as low as or lower than its own, and selling to a country whose currency has not depreciated, the country that has gone off the gold standard is enabled to keep down its cost of production, and has an enormous competitive advantage in its foreign commerce over the country whose commerce has not depreciated.

In Great Britain the pound has gone down substantially 25 per cent. The production costs have gone up about 5 per cent.

In Sweden the kroner has gone down 26 per cent and the production costs have not changed.

In Norway the krone has gone down 26 per cent and the production costs have gone up 1½ per cent.

In Finland the markka has gone down 36½ per cent and the production cost has gone up 13½ per cent. The latter country shows the highest increase in production costs of any country that has gone off the gold standard.

In Japan the yen has gone off 35½ per cent and the production costs have gone up 8 per cent.

In Canada, whose currency has depreciated 11 per cent, though she has not gone off the gold standard, the cost of production has gone up 2½ per cent.

The figures that I have given are taken on the 1st day of March of the current year. The figures for the month of February in all of these countries but Japan show a slight upward move in the currency value and a stationary or decreasing value in the cost of production. Therefore, I think it is fair to say that whatever the theoretics of the situation may be we people of the United States find ourselves up against a situation where our own industries can not successfully compete in our own markets with a large part of the rest of the world.

Mr. President, the theory, right or wrong, lived up to or not lived up to, of the tariff laws that have been enacted under Republican control of Congress is that they shall, as far as possible, equalize the cost of production at home and abroad. If such was the effect of the Hawley-Smoot tariff law at the time of its enactment, no one can claim that such is its effect now that foreign currencies have depreciated. If, as some of my friends on the other side of the Chamber and even possibly some on this side claim, some of the rates in the law were, at the time of its enactment, too high, it is hardly the time to change the effect of the law, as this fall in foreign currencies is changing it by lowering the degree of protection on all rates, whether they have been too high, too low, or whether fair and equitable, when our industries are facing the greatest crisis in the history of the country and are in the direst need of help.

Under the Hawley-Smoot law many articles were left on the free list either because such articles were not in competition with products of this country or because they could meet the competition without tariff protection. In the latter case no one can maintain that the drop in the foreign cost of production leaves unaffected the status quo for articles that were on the free list.

The free list of to-day, to be the free list of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, must be based on a world standard for currency, just as must the dutiable list. All that we who favor this amendment ask for is that we be put back on the same competitive basis with the rest of the world that we occupied in 1930. We do not even ask that. The excise tax in the amendment is based not on the American value but on the value of the article imported for customs duties according to the foreign import value, and that gives the importer a very considerable advantage.

I understand that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is about to offer an amendment which I have examined, and my remarks are based on his amendment. It changes very little the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Before the British went off the gold standard the pound was worth $4.86. An article on the free list worth a pound in Great Britain brought $4.86 plus the cost of transportation to this country. If a 50 per cent duty was imposed on the article, its landing cost was $4.86 plus $2.43, or $7.25, plus the cost of transportation. The pound having depreciated 25 per cent, its home value in terms of our currency would be $3.64; and, if on the free list, that plus the cost of transportation would be the price at which the article would be landed in this country to compete with our own product, costing to produce slightly more than $4.86. This is assuming that before the depreciation of the British currency the two articles were on an even competitive basis on landing in this country.

If the article were dutiable at 50 per cent, as heretofore cited, the duty would be levied on the British value for customs duties of $3.64, and would amount to $1.82, or a landed value of $5.46, as against the former landed value of $7.29, plus transportation costs, which represented the landed value needed under the Hawley-Smoot law for fair competition.

As a matter of fact, the British cost of production has gone up 5 per cent, which would raise the landed value of an article on the free list, worth a pound in Great Britain, 18 cents, or $3.82, and an article dutiable at 50 per cent, 27 cents, or $5.73.

The amendment offered would add an excise tax of 25 per cent of $3.82, the British value for customs duties, with the 5 per cent rise in the cost of production included, or a landed value for the article, if on the free list, of $4.78, plus transportation cost, and for the dutiable article of $6.69, plus transportation cost. In both cases the foreigner will still retain a considerable advantage.

If the amendment is adopted we will not be as well off as we were in 1930, while the importer will be by so much the better off; but we will at least be better off than we are now, and will have some chance against the ruinous competition which faces us unless some preventive action is taken. That with the tremendous advantage of their lower cost of production in terms of our currency we have not already been flooded with a greater inrush of foreign products is due partly to the fact that industry all over the world is stagnant and partly to the fact that our competitors do not wish to show their hand until this Congress has adjourned. Already, though the foreign inrush has not yet manifested itself in full force, prices in our home market have been broken and industries forced to meet foreign prices that will bankrupt them if continued.

That this coming foreign competition is limited to no one class of business, but to all kinds of competitive industry, is evidenced by the fact that the witnesses appearing recently before the Ways and Means Committee of the House in favor of the Hawley bill, which embodied some of the terms of this amendment, but is much more drastic in its effect, represented different types of industry in all sections of the country.

Among the witnesses in behalf of the bill were the American Iron and Steel Industry, the Georgia Kaolin Co., the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, the fish canners of the Pacific coast, silk manufacturers, sardine canners, wool manufacturers, linen manufacturers, lace-curtain manufacturers, pulp and pulpwood and paper manufacturers, wire-cloth manufacturers, pottery, vegetable, fish oil and meal manufacturers, and the National Association of Manufacturers.

We believe that we are asking nothing more than fair treatment. We are offering an amendment which will help to save the industries of the country and give work to American workmen. It is inconceivable that, with 8,000,000 Americans out of work, we should refuse to give any aid at all to our suffering American industries and allow the foreigner to enrich himself at our expense, while we maintain the gold standard and save the credit system of the world.

Under estimates made by the Treasury Department the estimates will bring in, in revenue to our Government, annually, between ninety and one hundred million dollars. The figures are based on the imports for the first three months of the current year and assume an equal proportionate volume of imports for the next nine months. Every bit of the tax will be paid by the foreigner.

I can conceive of no better way to build up our suffering industries, give work to our unemployed, and get from the rest of the world approximately $100,000,000 toward the balancing of our Budget, while still leaving our foreign competitors on a better competitive footing than before their currencies depreciated.

Under estimates made by the Treasury Department which I have before me, the amendment will bring in revenues to our Government of between ninety and one hundred million dollars a year. These figures are based on the imports of the first four months of the current year.

I ask that the figures as to the estimated duties be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Imports into the United States from countries for which the currency is depreciated 5 per cent or more from January to April, 1932, inclusive

[2] Includes minor noncompetitive commodities.

Estimate for entire calendar year (providing for exclusion from total of noncompetitive commodities not specifically listed), $90,000,000 to $100,000,000.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the estimated duty to compensate for depreciated exchange is $37,016,988 for four months. That would amount to $111,000,000 for the full year. In these figures are included a few of the commodities that are excluded under the provisions of the amendment, and which we do not produce in this country, so that a conservative estimate is anywhere between ninety million and one hundred million dollars.

Every cent of this tax will be paid not by this country but by the foreigner. I can conceive of no better way to build up our suffering industries, give work to our unemployed, and get from the rest of the world $100,000,000 toward the balancing of our Budget, while still leaving our foreign competitors on a better competitive footing than they were on before their currencies depreciated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this amendment is the same as a bill that was referred to the Finance Committee. The Finance Committee has not had hearings upon it yet, and I think it would be very much better to let the committee have hearings upon the measure, for, as chairman of the committee, I have received a great many applications to be heard on it if it is to be taken up. It is for that reason that I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in common with other Senators, I have received a great many communications pro and con upon this question. It evidently is one which is receiving a good deal of attention in the industrial life of the country. I find a difference of opinion as to the effect the depreciated currencies have upon our imports and exports. I have been unable, in the limited study I have been able to give to this problem, to reach any final judgment. I have in mind, however, that the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, Mr. Robert Lincoln O'Brien, appearing before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, took the position that we should not raise our tariff levels, in view of the evidence on the subject so far investigated by the United States Tariff Commission.

Regardless of the merits or demerits of this issue—and I think it is a very important one, because there is very strong opinion pro and con on the subject—I think I shall adhere to the opinion I have entertained heretofore, that this internal revenue bill should not contain items dealing with the tariff, that a question of this kind ought to be treated separately and independent of the consideration of purely internal-revenue questions. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Senator from Massachusetts is aware, I believe, that a select committee was appointed by the Senate to deal with this subject. Of that committee the able senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is chairman and I happen to be a member. The Senator is also aware, no doubt, that the committee has never met, much less reported upon the subject to the Senate. Further, I venture to say that there is no immediate urgency about the legislation here sought, and that such an emergency may more wisely be dealt with otherwise, if it should arise.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am most grateful to the Senator for his observation. I did not know what progress the committee had made.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that Mr. O'Brien's objections to the Hawley bill, which are substantially the same in effect as this amendment, were not that the cost of production would undoubtedly go up and that therefore we would not need the protection afforded under this amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood he appeared in opposition to the so-called Hawley bill, that he believed that in the near future there might be a necessity of some increases in our tariff duties, but that he did not favor the Hawley bill.

Mr. HALE. I know he did not, and I tried to explain that in my remarks. But the cost of production, as I said in my remarks, and as I have tried here to show, has gone up very little in comparison with the depreciation of the currencies, and the trend, instead of being upward at the present time, is downward.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was about to suggest that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House have recently considered this question and have voted, by a very large majority, against the proposition involved in this amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am very glad to have that information.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, it is history that prior to the enactment of the tariff act of 1922 German exchange had fallen almost unbelievably. There was general apprehension as that time, as now, that the depreciation of the German mark would precipitate a flood of goods from abroad into this country. The so-called flexible tariff provisions were accordingly written into the law as a safeguard, and it is noteworthy that the dreaded invasion of foreign gods did not materialize, as anticipated with real concern. It is of importance that so striking and helpful an experience of recent history, within the memory of present Members of the Senate, be recalled.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his observation. In any event, it seems to me, regardless of the merits or demerits of this question, that those of us who are taking the position that there should not be any tariff items in the pending bill ought to vote against this proposal. I do want to say, however, that there seems to be a good deal of agitation in the country—whether it is propaganda or not I do not know—and sooner or later some one in authority ought to assure the country of the absolute effect of the depreciated currencies on our imports and exports.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had the honor of being named the chairman of the select committee that was appointed to study this question. Since that committee was appointed we have been working every day and nearly every evening in the Senate on the tax bill, and it has been utterly impossible to call the committee together. I know that no one in the Senate will misunderstand the reason why the committee has not been called together.

Some time ago I offered an amendment substantially to the same effect as that now offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], except that under my amendment no extra duty was to be imposed unless the depreciation of the currency of the country from which the import was received amounted to more than 5 per cent of its standard value. Obviously it is impractical, because of a very slight day-to-day fluctuation in the exchange rates, to impose a duty of a fraction of 1 per cent, which might last for only 24 hours.

For that reason I thought that the effect of the amendment ought to be limited to those countries the depreciation of whose currency amounted to something substantial, and I wonder whether the Senator from Washington might not consider the acceptance of that amendment in lieu of the one he has proposed?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, while I would like to see just as strong an amendment as possible adopted, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania in the hope that we will get the matter to conference, and that it may be worked out in conference.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether there is any provision in the amendment by the Senator from Maine, as proposed, or in the suggested addition of the Senator from Pennsylvania which relates the further duty now urged to foreign prices, as well as to foreign exchange? It is assumed that prices which tend to correct the difficulty by adjusting themselves to fluctuating exchange are of much larger significance.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; there is not. I ought to add further that I know that there would be great resistance, both in the Senate and in the House, to the use of this amendment in taking articles from the free list and putting them on the dutiable list, and for that reason I have modified the amendment as printed so as to limit it to articles now upon the dutiable list. To that extent it meets some of the objections interposed against it.

I would like to send the amendment to the desk and have it read, and then ask the Senator from Washington whether he is willing to accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the proper place in the bill insert:

SEC. —. There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all dutiable articles imported into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam) directly or indirectly from any foreign country the value of whose currency on date of exportation of such articles, as measured by the buying rate in the New York market at noon as determined by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, is more than 5 per cent below the standard value of such currency as proclaimed by the Secretary of the Treasury an excise tax of 1 per cent of the value of such articles for customs duties for each 1 per cent that the value of such currency as determined under existing law by the said Federal Reserve Bank of New York, is less than the standard value of such currency as proclaimed under existing law by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington accept the amendment?

Mr. JONES. As I indicated a moment ago, I am glad to accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington modifies his amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not going to take very much more time. I think it is worthy of note that last September, when Great Britain and the other countries of the continent of Europe went off the gold standard, within a few hours Germany was able by presidential decree to establish such a tariff as is now proposed here.

Our democracy has been laboring along for eight months since then, and it has only reached the stage of a proposition for similar action in one House of Congress. At the same time that Germany put on her emergency tariff against these countries with depreciated currencies, other countries took the same action. Italy, I am informed, did so. Canada did so against those countries whose currency was further depreciated than her own. We have taken no such action. The results have been, as I showed the Senate at considerable length a couple of months ago, that the imports from the countries whose currency is depreciated have very greatly increased, in spite of the depreciation in business.

Mr. O'Brien, chairman of the Tariff Commission, testified before the Ways and Means Committee that he was opposed to any action on this subject for the reason that in the long run this disparity would correct itself; and undoubtedly that is so. What we want to do by these proposals is to take care of the American producer and the American workman in the interval of the lag between the depreciation of the currency and the ultimate inevitable correction by a rise of prices or a restoration of the gold standard in these countries. It is that interval, which is always somewhat protracted, in which the relief is necessary.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HALE. My attention was diverted when the Senator from Pennsylvania introduced his amendment. Were any changes made in the original amendment submitted by the Senator?

Mr. REED. I have restricted the amendment to articles on the dutiable list.

Mr. HALE. There is no fairness in that.

Mr. REED. I agree with that.

Mr. HALE. That leaves out entirely everything that is on the free list. As I have tried to show, the free list of to-day is not the free list of the time of the Hawley-Smoot bill. On an article of the value of a pound the foreigner has an advantage of $1.22.

Mr. REED. I know that.

Mr. HALE. The theory of placing an article on the free list is that it is able to meet the competition of other countries without protection.

Mr. REED. I know that; but I think it is a practical question—a question of what we can get through.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it is in any way fair. I hope the Senator will withdraw that suggestion and put the amendment in as I understand he originally offered it.

Mr. REED. I am apprehensive the amendment in the original form can not be adopted. If the Senator would like to try it in that fashion, with the permission of the Senator from Washington, we will offer it to apply to all articles, both dutiable and free. Of course the logic of the situation applies just as much to products on the free list as to articles on the dutiable list. What I am trying to do is to get some relief for at least some American workmen. If the Senator from Maine wishes it offered in the fashion as originally printed, I am glad to agree to it if the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is.

Mr. JONES. I heartily agree to the suggestion.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think an advantage of $1.22 to the foreigner on an article of the value of a pound is fair to our producers of an article on the free list?

Mr. REED. I think it is entirely unfair to the American producer.

Mr. HALE. All I ask is that we be put back where we were before the other countries went off in their currency.

Mr. REED. To my mind that is a reasonable request, but I know of two or three votes in the Senate that can not be obtained for the amendment in that fashion.

Mr. HALE. I can not see how any Senator who has any regard for our American industry and our American workmen can possibly oppose this when we need to get revenue to balance our Budget. As I have shown, we will get nearly $100,000,000 in this way and not have to pay one cent out of our Treasury.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator fully, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to in the form in which it was printed.

Mr. HALE. I hope so, too.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if we are to have a series of amendments on this proposal and the debate is to be prolonged, I shall desire to test out the purpose of the Senate as to whether we are now going to hold up the passage of the revenue bill, after we have made an arrangement to balance the Budget, in order to enter upon a controverted subject that is foreign to the provisions of the bill. I can not understand how Senators can expect to settle on the revenue bill all tariff questions or the tariff questions involved in this amendment. They must accept the responsibility for the delay in the passage of the revenue bill which such a course involves.

We have had three amendments proposed relating to the same general subject, and all the while, by express order of the Senate, the subject matter of the amendments is pending before a special committee of the Senate selected for the purpose of making an inquiry and advising the Senate what action had best be taken.

Mr. HALE. The Senate can not wait to act on the report of a special committee——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maine wishes to interrupt me, I should be glad to yield to him if he would pursue the course which the Chair instructs him to pursue, and would address the Chair and get consent for the interruption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this matter can not be forced into the pending bill without fair consideration, and it ought not to be discussed in a merely perfunctory manner. It is an important subject. The Senate has recognized the difficulty and the complications which underlie it by creating a special committee to study it. Yet here, after we have spent two weeks under the whip and spur of the emergency, reaching out in every direction to find revenue to balance our National Budget and maintain our national credit, some who are primarily responsible for the bill insist upon deferring final action until a question admittedly controversial, admittedly largely foreign to the subject matter of the pending legislation, a question which has been referred to a special committee and not acted upon by that committee, shall be threshed out here on the floor of the Senate. It is wrong. It is unjustifiable.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can only repeat what I have already said, that I trust that the amendment will not be put upon the bill. I am in favor of the proposition, as the Senator from Maine knows, but right at this moment I am more interested in balancing the Budget and getting confidence back into the United States than I am in having the amendment put upon this bill. I do not believe it could be put on the bill, anyhow.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think the enactment of this provision would help to bring back confidence to the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to take up the Senator's proposal in the Finance Committee and call a meeting at the very earliest date possible to consider his bill. I will say to the Senator now that as a matter of legislation by itself there is a great deal of merit in it, and justice too, but this is not the place to put it. It should not be acted upon in this way. I am in hopes we can get this bill through to-night. I know what the situation is in the country. I know what it means to hold up the bill longer.

Mr. PITTMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada declines to yield.

Mr. PITTMÁN. I am sorry, but I do not want the bill delayed by any further speeches.

There has been a special committee appointed, as the Senator from Arkansas has stated, of which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is chairman. Not only did the resolution creating that committee require information with regard to the effect upon our imports by reason of the differentiation in exchange, but also upon our exports. We have only received a partial report from the Tariff Commission. It deals with our imports. They are preparing a report dealing with our exports.

There is still another factor in it which to my knowledge has not yet been brought out. While the question of the difference in exchange has been brought up, the facts are that there has been an increase in wages in those countries as the exchange has fallen, which is undoubtedly a factor, and the evidence is not before the committee now.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I have charts here showing the costs of production in Norway, Sweden, Finland, Denmark, the United Kingdom, British India, Canada, and Japan.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no doubt the Senator from Maine knows all about the subject, but the committee does not, and the Senate does not, nor does the Tariff Commission.

Mr. President, I know this amendment is going to be voted down, because the Republican side of the Chamber can not afford longer to delay the passage of the bill. I wish to say that at the present time we are advised that we know what will balance the Budget. Possibly in a week from now we may not know, but we can pass the bill to-night and know we will balance the Budget. We realized four or five months ago that a very much smaller sum would have been needed to balance the Budget, but there were a great many Congressmen who did not believe it would be needed to balance the Budget, and it developed that they were right. Another estimate came up, and still they did not believe it was sufficient, and again they were right. That has happened several times. Now we think we know it is right. I hope it will develop that there will be a surplus over and above what we estimate to be the exact amount needed.

I think we should vote right now on the proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the perfected amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. JONES. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has announced the vote. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 84, line 19, after "account," insert a comma and the following: "including taxes and other carrying charges on unimproved and unproductive real property, but no such adjustment shall be made for taxes or other carrying charges for which deductions have been taken by the taxpayer in determining net income for the taxable year or prior taxable years."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to permit charging taxes and interest against the capital account on unproductive and unimproved property. If a property is worth $1,000 and taxes and interest were added for five years, they might be added and deducted from the ultimate sale, provided they were not charged against current income. It was the practice of the department in reference to the revenue acts of 1924, 1926, and 1928, to permit the action which I am proposing; but a case which was determined in the fifth circuit threw out the action of the department as unlawful in permitting the deduction.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that I do not know exactly what effect this would have upon the revenues of the country, but I do not think it will be very much. I am willing to let it go to conference, if the Senate agrees to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I presented yesterday an amendment which was considered rather too broad. I have limited it and submitted it to the chairman of the Finance Committee and I believe he is agreeable to it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 316, after line 5, insert the following new section:

SEC. —. REFUND OR CREDIT OF A TAX PAID BY TWO OR MORE PERSONS, CORPORATIONS, PARTNERSHIPS, OR FIDUCIARIES ON THE SAME INCOME OR THE SAME ESTATE IN EXCESS OF THE TAX LAWFULLY DUE

In the case a tax has been paid by two or more persons, corporations, partnerships, or fiduciaries on the same income or the same estate the tax so paid in excess of that lawfully due shall, notwithstanding any agreement entered into, be reunded or be credited under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Provided, That claim therefor is filed within seven years from the date the tax was so paid.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida whether he would expect interest to be paid?

Mr. FLETCHER. No. It does not provide for that. It just provides for a refund of credit as the department should find.

Mr. KING. I am not sure, if a refund were granted, that interest would not be allowed. It would seem where payment was made in that way and a settlement was effected by the parties and by the Government, and a mistake occurred of the character indicated, there ought not to be any interest charged.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think they are going to charge interest upon it. In case where the tax has been paid by two or more persons, where it has actually been paid twice, and the Government has the money, all the amendment asks is that it may be refunded or credited as the department may determine.

Mr. SMOOT. It would, I fear, open up cases that have been determined. I do not know how far the amendment would go, and I do not know how many cases there might be. I am told by the Treasury Department it is a very dangerous amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is not the amendment we had under discussion previously.

Mr. SMOOT. But I just handed a copy of it to the expert of the department who thinks it is a very dangerous amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think there is any danger about it; there can not be any danger in the Government doing the honest thing.

Mr. SMOOT. It would establish a precedent, though, Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there is an amendment which I suggested to the committee amendment regarding the reserve funds of life-insurance companies, on pages 145 and 146, that was passed over. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if it would be agreeable to him to take that up at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the very next amendment, and when I got a chance I was going to ask that it be considered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there are not very many Senators in the Chamber now, and there is very general interest in that amendment. Might it not be better to let it go over until more of the Senators may come in from dinner?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts is going to offer the sales-tax amendment; the amendment relating to the insurance companies involves a complicated question, and I should like to have it considered by the Senate before it is exhausted.

Mr. REED. I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts will agree to that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would be very glad to have the amendment disposed of before I proceed with the amendment I intend to offer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With that understanding, I am willing to wait until along about 8 o'clock.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have a little amendment which I hope will not provoke any controversy. I think the chairman of the committee is familiar with it, and I hope he will accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 262 in the committee amendment heretofore adopted, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert the words "or with any person other than a dealer," so as to read:

If a contract of the character above described was made with the United States or with any person other than a dealer, no tax shall be collected under this title.

Mr. SMOOT. Is that amendment in the form the Senator showed me the other day?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; and I think the Senator has a copy of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment at that point was adopted. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to is reconsidered. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the adoption of the Connally amendment and the rates thereunder has necessitated some changes to carry out that amendment. I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it may be read. It is really a series of amendments, but they relate to the same subject. I may also say that I have 10 or 11 other amendments of a clarifying nature which I want to offer following the one now offered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the nature of the amendment the Senator now proposes?

Mr. SMOOT. It is to make readjustments in the bill made necessary because of the adoption of the Connally amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think my colleague should state that the amendments which he is about to offer were all presented to the committee, considered by the committee, and unanimously agreed to by it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and they were all prepared by the Treasury Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The amendment offered by Mr. SMOOT was read, as follows:

On page 16, lines 3 and 6, strike out "$20,000" and insert "$16,000."

On page 48, line 7, strike out "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

On page 48, line 14, strike out "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

On page 119, line 7, strike out "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

On page 121, line 3, strike out "9 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "8 per cent."

On page 121, line 17, strike out "9 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "8 per cent."

On page 123, line 5, strike out "9 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "8 per cent."

On page 124, line 24, strike out "9 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "8 per cent."

On page 157, line 17, strike out "9 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "8 per cent."

On page 157, line 24, strike out "3 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "4 per cent."

On page 158, line 5, strike out "3 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "4 per cent."

On page 158, at the end of line 6, add the word "and."

On page 158, strike out lines 7 to 12, both inclusive.

On page 158, line 13, strike out "(3) 9 per cent" and insert in lieu thereof "(2) 8 per cent."

On page 158, line 15, strike out "paragraphs (1) and (2)" and insert in lieu thereof "paragraph (1)."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments just read.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I send to the desk the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 23, line 2, after the word "except," it is proposed to insert "(1)," and in line 7, after "title" insert a comma and the following: "or (2) on indebtedness incurred or continued in connection with the purchasing or carrying of an annuity."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 25, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "debt" in line 24 and all of line 25 and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "in an amount not in excess of the part charged off within the taxable year, as a deduction."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 83, line 24, after the period it is proposed to insert a new sentence to read as follows:

The basis in the case of property held by a corporation during any period, in the taxable year 1929 or any subsequent taxable year, in respect of which a consolidated return is made by such corporation under section 141 of this act or the revenue act of 1928, shall be adjusted in respect of any items relating to such period, in accordance with regulations prescribed under section 141(b) of this act or the revenue act of 1928, applicable to such period.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 88, line 22, after the word "year," it is proposed to insert a comma and the following: "excluding from such gross income an amount equal to any rents or royalties paid or incurred by the taxpayer in respect of the property."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 89, line 8, after the word "year," it is proposed to insert a comma and the following: "excluding from such gross income an amount equal to any rents or royalties paid or incurred by the taxpayer in respect of the property."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment at that point was agreed to will be reconsidered, and, without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah is agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 112, line 15, it is proposed to strike out all after the comma through "(3)" in line 20 and insert "and (2)."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 204, after line 10, it is proposed to insert a new subsection as follows:

(c) The tax shall not apply to a transfer of property in trust where the power to revest in the donor title to such property is vested—

(1) In the donor, either alone or in conjunction with any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such property or the income therefrom, or

(2) In any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such property or the income therefrom, but the relinquishment or termination of such power (other than by the donor's death) shall be considered to be a transfer by the donor by gift of the property subject to such power, and any payment of the income therefrom to a beneficiary other than the donor shall be considered to be a transfer by the donor of such income by gift.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I also offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 315, in line 12, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. CREDIT OF OVERPAYMENTS

(a) If any internal-revenue tax was, within the period of limitation properly applicable thereto, assessed prior to June 2, 1924, and if a claim was filed, or a request in writing made, for a credit against the tax so assessed of an amount claimed as an overpayment of internal-revenue tax, and if collection of any part of the tax so assessed was postponed, then (1) a credit (made prior to May 29, 1928) against the tax so assessed shall not be considered as void under the provisions of section 609 (a) of the revenue act of 1928, relating to erroneous credits, and (2) the payment (made prior to May 29, 1928) of the part of the tax the payment of which was so postponed shall not be considered as an overpayment under the provisions of section 607 of the revenue act of 1928, relating to payments made after the expiration of the period of limitation on assessment and collection.

(b) As used in subsection (a), the term "tax" includes any interest, penalty, additional amount, or addition to any internal-revenue tax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 315, after line 12, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. LIMITATION ON PROSECUTIONS FOR INTERNAL-REVENUE OFFENSES

(a) The act entitled "An act to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal revenue laws," approved July 5, 1884, as amended, and as reenacted by section 1110 of the revenue act of 1926, is amended to read as follows:

"That no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished, for any of the various offenses arising under the internal revenue laws of the United States unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within three years next after the commission of the offense, except that the period of limitation shall be six years—

"(1) for offenses involving the defrauding or attempting to defraud the United States or any agency thereof, whether by conspiracy or not, and in any manner,

"(2) for the offense of willfully attempting in any manner to evade or defeat any tax or the payment thereof, and

"(3) for the offense of willfully aiding or assisting in, or procuring, counseling, or advising, the preparation or presentation under, or in connection with any matter arising under, the internal revenue laws, of a false or fraudulent return, affidavit, claim, or document (whether or not such falsity or fraud is with the knowledge or consent of the person authorized or required to present such return, affidavit, claim, or document).

"For offenses arising under section 37 of the Criminal Code, where the object of the conspiracy is to attempt in any manner to evade or defeat any tax or the payment thereof, the period of limitation shall also be six years. The time during which the person committing any of the offenses above mentioned is absent from the district wherein the same is committed shall not be taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of such proceedings. Where a complaint is instituted before a commissioner of the United States within the period above limited, the time shall be extended until the discharge of the grand jury at its next session within the district."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) of this section shall apply to offenses whenever committed; except that it shall not apply to offenses the prosecution of which was barred before the date of the enactment of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 315, after line 12, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. ADJUSTMENTS OF CARRIERS' TAX LIABILITIES TO CONFORM TO RECAPTURE PAYMENTS

The Interstate Commerce Commission shall, as soon as practicable after its order with respect to the amount recoverable from any carrier under the provisions of section 15a of the interstate commerce act, as amended, for any year or portion thereof has become final and such amount, if any, has been paid, certify to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the amount so paid. If the amount so paid by such carrier differs from the amount allowed as so recoverable in computing the income or excess profits tax liabilities for any taxable period of such carrier, or of any corporation whose income or excess profits tax liability is affected, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall determine any deficiency or overpayment attributable to such difference. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, (1) any such deficiency may be assessed within two years from the date of such certification, and, if so assessed, shall be paid upon notice and demand from the collector, and (2) any such overpayment may be credited or refunded within two years from the date of such certification, but not after unless, before the expiration of such period, a claim therefor is filed. This section shall not be held to affect the provisions of sections 1106 (b) of the revenue act of 1926 or 606 of the revenue act of 1928.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 240, it is proposed to strike out lines 21 to 24, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(5) such tax (except tax under subsection (c) (4) to (7), inclusive) shall be imposed in full notwithstanding any provision of law granting exemption from or reduction of duties to products of any possession of the United States; and for the purposes of taxes under subsection (c) (4) to (7), inclusive, the term "United States" includes Puerto Rico.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 285, it is proposed to strike out lines 11 to 19, inclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 32, following the word "exchanges," in line 13, and following the word "assets," in line 21, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert in parentheses as follows: "(including gains which may be derived by a taxpayer from the retirement of its own obligations.)"

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a word of explanation.

Mr. KING. I should like to have an explanation of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposes to amend an amendment heretofore agreed to, so that the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will have to be reconsidered.

Mr. REED. The committee amendment was passed over at my request. I do not think it has been agreed to.

Mr. KING. If it has been, there will be no objection to reconsidering the vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported, and the question as to the necessity for reconsideration will be determined.

Mr. REED. I can explain this amendment in two minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, however, that the committee amendment has been agreed to. Without objection, it will be reconsidered.

Mr. REED. Just a word in explanation.

The Finance Committee had decided, rather drastically, that the deduction of losses should be limited to the amount of gains in securities that the taxpayer realizes during the tax year. With that decision I make no quarrel. Last November, however, the Supreme Court of the United States decided, in the Kirby Lumber case, that where a corporation bought its own bonds at less than par, it realized a taxable profit. If that is a gain, as the Supreme Court has decided, it is only justice that it should be allowed to be considered as a gain in offsetting against losses in that year.

The amendment does not change the principle decided by the Finance Committee at all. It simply provides that that gain may be taken into consideration in the same way that gains from dealing in somebody else's stocks or bonds are taken into consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, has the Senator any information as to the field that would be entered into, as to the number of corporations that have dealt in their own bonds, that might result in very serious dimimution of the revenue?

Mr. REED. I think that any possible deficiency in revenue would be very slight indeed; and it is only a reasonable application of this rule which the Finance Committee has decided upon. I would suggest that if any Senator has doubt about it—particularly the junior Senator from Utah, who is going to be a conferee himself—the amendment might be allowed to go to conference, and its justice could be further considered there.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to express the hope that this amendment may be adopted. I think it is a salutary amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Kiwanis Club of East Aurora, N. Y., favoring retrenchment in governmental expenditures and the balancing of the Budget, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Long Island Chamber of Commerce; the Huntington Chamber of Commerce, of Huntington; and the Sag Harbor Round Table Club, of Sag Harbor, Long Island, all in the State of New York, favoring retrenchment in governmental expenditures, and protesting against the passage of legislation to increase the financial obligations of the Government, and also any legislation that might impair the stability of the currency, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Nunda (N. Y.) Club of Rotary International, favoring reduction in the compensation of all Government officials, the prompt balancing of the Budget and the early adjournment of the present session of Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Veteran Association, Twenty-third Regiment, One hundred and sixth Infantry, New York National Guard, Brooklyn, N. Y., protesting against the passage of legislation curtailing the officer personnel on the active list of the Army by 2,000, and also the curtailment of funds for the maintenance of the National Guard, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the citizens' military training camps, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 756) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting sundry nominations of postmasters, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I well appreciate that the Senate is very anxious to conclude the consideration of this bill to-night. Heretofore I have taken some time in opposing the adoption particularly of the tariff on oil and gasoline. I am not disposed to precipitate a debate which will consume a large amount of time. I intend shortly to move a reconsideration of paragraph numbered (4), beginning with line 3 on page 243. However, in order to save time and not actually make the motion, it occurs to me that a unanimous-consent agreement at this time will eliminate a lot of debate.

It is now 27 minutes of 8. I ask unanimous consent that at quarter of 8, 12 minutes away, the Senate have a record roll-call vote on a motion to reconsider paragraph (4), page 243, beginning with line 3.

Mr. SMOOT. That is crude petroleum?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is crude petroleum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, does the Senator move a reconsideration?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will move a reconsideration if unanimous consent is denied, and I will have to speak in favor of it when I am trying to end debate on it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator was asking a unanimous-consent agreement that we vote on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, if we lose the motion to reconsider, I shall not feel impelled to carry on the contest longer. I am trying to accommodate myself to the opponents of my position as well as those who favor it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am trying to avoid delay.

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall have to speak on it and ask for a vote if the agreement is denied.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If the Senator desires to go into a lengthy debate——

Mr. TYDINGS. I propose to have a vote at quarter of 8.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If the motion is made and a vote is asked for without debate, of course I have no objection.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right. I ask unanimous consent that at quarter of 8 we may have a record roll-call vote on the motion to reconsider paragraph (4), page 243.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Without any further discussion?

Mr. TYDINGS. Without any further discussion.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have no objection to a roll-call vote at this time, but if the proponent of the motion desires to take some time for argument I think we should have the same time on the opposite side.

Mr. TYDINGS. Exactly so. But may I say to the Senator from Oklahoma that all I want to do is, without any heat and without even the attendance of the Members who are absent, to express my position in a very brief way and then ask for the roll-call vote? I have nothing to say which would, I believe, provoke an argument.

Mr. SMOOT. What does the Senator mean by "a brief statement"?

Mr. TYDINGS. I simply want briefly to say why I think it would be inadvisable, without going into an extended argument. I can not do much in seven minutes; but if I am denied this unanimous-consent agreement I shall have to go on and speak about it and ask for a quorum call, and others will do the same thing.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I will not consent to a unanimous-consent agreement unless the roll has been called and a quorum developed.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I say to the Senator from West Virginia, who may misunderstand the situation, that I am entitled now to move a reconsideration of the amendment and to get a roll call by simply having the quorum call and having enough hands raised; but in order to save time and to dispose of this matter at the earliest possible date, I was hoping to avoid the debate and have the thing over with one way or the other.

Mr. HATFIELD. Let us have a quorum call, and then let the Senator propound his request.

Mr. TYDINGS. All right.

Mr. HATFIELD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia makes the point of no quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hull	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Couzens	Johnson	Sheppard
Bailey	Cutting	Jones	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dale	Kean	Smith
Barbour	Davis	Kendrick	Smoot
Barkley	Dickinson	Keyes	Steiwer
Bingham	Dill	King	Stephens
Black	Fess	La Follette	Thomas, Idaho
Blaine	Fletcher	Logan	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Frazier	McGill	Townsend
Bratton	George	McKellar	Trammell
Broussard	Glenn	McNary	Tydings
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Moses	Vandenberg
Bulow	Gore	Neely	Wagner
Byrnes	Hale	Norris	Walcott
Capper	Harrison	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hastings	Oddie	Watson
Carey	Hatfield	Patterson	Wheeler
Cohen	Hayden	Pittman	White
Connally	Hebert	Reed
Coolidge	Howell	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Maryland will please again propound his unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in order to save the time of the Senate and prevent, as I imagine all Members want to prevent, a long discussion of matters which we have already passed upon, I ask unanimous consent that at 5 minutes to 8 the Senate may have a record roll-call vote upon a motion to reconsider paragraph (4), beginning at line 3, on page 243, which is the oil tariff.

It is my intention, if the Senate accedes to my request, to discuss this matter very briefly, at the conclusion of which time, after stating my own position and why I feel that I have had to oppose this tariff in as uncontroversial a way as possible, we may vote upon this matter and dispose of it for all time.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says "very briefly." Can we not have an understanding——

Mr. TYDINGS. It can not be over 10 minutes. My proposal is that at 5 minutes of 8 we vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further for just a moment, I desire to give notice that after the Senator concludes and has his vote I shall ask for the same action, without debate, on the amendment on coal.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in outlining my reason for opposing this legislation.

It is not my intention to dwell upon the merits or demerits of inserting tariff items in a bill of this kind at such a time. I addressed myself to that phase of the matter some time ago. Suffice it to say now that I think it was a mistake to put those matters in. They have delayed the passage of the bill, and it would have been better had they been in a separate bill, together with other tariff items, so that the whole subject matter might have been considered at one time. That point has long since been passed, however. The matters are now in the bill.

I also concede the fact that the oil industry, particularly the independent oil-well producer and owner, is in a distressful condition. But may I point out in passing that is the exact situation of all other business in the United States at this time. You can go to the farmer, you can go to the manufacturer, you can go to the oil producers, and everywhere you go, every business you discuss, every investigation you make, you find that all businesses are at a point where the line between existence and nonexistence is a very faint one.

If I thought that this amendment would be of any particular benefit to the independent oil producer, I could conceive how it might receive some consideration here, but I can not conceive how it can be of any benefit to the independent oil producer.

In support of that fact, let me point out very briefly that 20 large oil companies at this hour own 51 per cent of all the oil production in the United States. They own 73 per cent of all the refineries in the United States. They own 95 per cent of all the storage capacity in the United States. They own 90 per cent of all the pipe lines in the United States. They own 85 per cent of the total retail distributing agencies of the country.

Moreover, Mr. President, they have at this minute 633,000,000 barrels of oil stored in the pipe lines which they own. When we add to the fact that they have 633,000,000 barrels stored the further fact that they own over 51 per cent of the total production in the United States, it means that they either have now in the pipe lines or in their production agencies enough oil to supply every bit of need in this country for over a year, without buying one gill of oil from any independent producer.

Does it not stand to reason, if these men can supply the entire needs of the United States for over a year without buying a gill of oil, that they are in a position in the meantime to make any price for the purchase of oil which they care to make, and that the independent producer has either to take the price offered, or has to let his oil stay in the ground?

The oil companies can wait a full year without buying one gill of oil and will have enough of their own oil to supply every demand in this country, and how in the name of high heaven and common sense the independent oil producer is going to get a single cent out of this tariff, in the face of those circumstances, is beyond me, and I believe beyond the realm of safe argument.

Not only that, but when we exclude, as it is hoped to do by this tariff, all importations of foreign oil, two things happen. First of all, if we exclude that oil which it is claimed can be produced more cheaply in South America than in this country, the oil that is excluded, which used to come into the United States, will then go to Europe, and because it can be produced more cheaply than our own oil, it will replace just that much American oil which is now exported abroad. The result will be that not a single pint of oil will be sold which is not now being sold. The oil which is excluded from entry into the United States will supplant the oil which we are now exporting from the United States.

Mark you, we are exporting more oil abroad, principally to Europe, than we are importing from all the rest of the world combined. Our exports of oil are greater than our imports, and if South American oil now coming into this country can be produced more cheaply in South America than in the United States, as is claimed, then that oil will be driven to compete with our export oil in Europe, and will take the market from our export oil in Europe, so that the oil we are now exporting will not find a market abroad. Therefore in the end no extra demand will be made for American oil at all. The independent producer, the facts indicate, will not make a single solitary dollar out of this tariff.

This is the real milk in the coconut. A tariff of 2½ cents a gallon on gasoline will raise the price of gasoline to the American consumer. Every advocate of the tariff frankly and honestly and in a commendable way states that the whole purpose of the oil tariff is to raise the price of oil in the United States. Raise the price to whom? To the American consumer of oil.

It means that it will make his gasoline and crude oil cost him more. How much more? The Treasury Department states that there were 16,500,000,000 gallons of gasoline used in this country last year. A tariff tax of 2½ cents a gallon will mean an increase in cost to the oil and gasoline purchasers of this country of $500,000,000 a year. The pity of it is that not one dollar of that will go into the Treasury of the United States, but all of it will go into the coffers and the treasuries of the 20 large oil companies, which at this hour have a year's gasoline and oil supply in their possession, without buying a gill from anybody.

If this tax of $500,000,000 were levied for the purposes of the Government, it would be bad enough, but at this hour of need, when agriculture is distressed, when every purchaser of fuel oil for heating his home is in a state of depression, when business is stagnant and paralyzed, to come along and attempt to saddle this huge burden of $500,000,000 on the distressed people of the United States, in my humble judgment, it is little short of a legislative felony. It is larceny in the first degree.

We quibble over putting a tax of a cent a gallon on gasoline for the benefit of the Government, but without so much as "by your leave" we put a 2½-cent increase in tariff tax upon this commodity for the benefit of 20 oil companies.

If the facts show that these large oil companies have at this minute enough oil in their pipe lines and in their production to supply the entire market in the United States for over a year without buying a gill of gasoline, I defy any man who claims to have good, ordinary common sense to show me how the independent producer is going to get a cent out of this tariff on oil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have still a minute, I think. It is 6 minutes of 8 o'clock.

Now is the time, the last opportunity, for Senators to protect the American taxpayer from this legislative outrage. The voters are awake to what we are doing here to-night, and I appeal to those who sit here and pretend to represent the people to end this farce, reconsider this item, and take this tariff item out of the bill.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hull	Reed
Austin	Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Couzens	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Barbour	Dale	Kendrick	Shipstead

Carey	Hastings	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Cohen	Hatfield	Oddie	Watson
Connally	Hayden	Patterson	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hebert	Pittman	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TYDINGS. For the benefit of those Senators who came in late, may I ask the Chair if a vote "yea" is a vote to reconsider and inferentially to strike out the oil tariff, and a vote "nay" is a vote to keep it in the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A vote "yea" is to bring the matter back to the Senate for further consideration. The clerk will read the section upon which the Senate is about to vote.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 243, after line 2, insert:

(4) Crude petroleum, ½ cent per gallon; fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and all liquid derivatives of crude petroleum, except lubricating oil and gasoline or other motor fuel, ½ cent per gallon; gasoline or other motor fuel, 2½ cents per gallon; lubricating oil, 4 cents per gallon; paraffin and other petroleum wax products, 1 cent per pound; natural asphalt and asphalt and bitumen derived from petroleum, 10 cents per 100 pounds. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the reconsideration of the vote by which the section just read was agreed to. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is necessarily absent. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." Therefore I must withdraw my vote.

Mr. WHEELER. My colleague the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. If the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] were present, they would vote "yea." If the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] were present, I understand he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—36

Bailey	Cohen	Harrison	Nye
Bankhead	Coolidge	Hebert	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Copeland	Hull	Shipstead
Black	Costigan	Kean	Smith

NOT VOTING—16

Bingham	Glenn	Lewis	Stephens
Brookhart	Hawes	Long	Swanson
Dale	Howell	Morrison	Walsh, Mont.
Glass	King	Schall	Waterman

So the Senate refused to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to submit a motion to reconsider. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted by the Senate levying an import tax of 10 cents per hundred pounds on coal, found on page 243, commencing in line 20, and ending on page 244, line 5. I ask unanimous consent that we have an immediate roll-call vote without debate upon my motion for reconsideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, if a vote may be had without a roll call I do not object; otherwise I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then I ask that there be a roll call on my motion to reconsider, because there are enough Senators interested in the matter to force the roll call. All the objection means is two roll calls.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not object to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. NEELY. I made the objection in the hope that we might save a roll call. Of course, if it is going to add another roll call, I am not going to prolong the agony. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is a little late, but I would like to say that every roll call costs the country $10,000. I see no occasion for this roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to reconsider. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). My pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] stands as announced on the previous vote, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. If the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] were present, they would vote "yea." If the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] were present, I understand he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas, 40, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—40

Bailey	Coolidge	Harrison	Norris

So the Senate refused to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for an immediate yea-and-nay vote on the motion which I entered to reconsider the vote by which the tariff on lumber was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should like to be informed what the question is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] to reconsider the vote whereby the duty on lumber was agreed to.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair as on the last roll call, and withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the general pair of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

So Mr. SHIPSTEAD's motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I entered a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment imposing a duty on copper was adopted. I think I know when I am defeated. So I ask leave to withdraw that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Massachusetts offers the following amendment: On page 240, line 7, to strike out all after the word "article," down to the semicolon in line 10.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the effect of that amendment would be to make the tariff duties provided in this bill subject to the flexible tariff provision. As the bill is now drawn the tariff duties proposed to be levied on certain items are imposed with the understanding that they shall not be subject to change or revision by the United States Tariff Commission. My amendment would eliminate that exclusion, and would make all these tariff items subject to petition for increase or decrease or change in duty the same as any other commodity upon which a tariff duty has been levied in the general law.

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the amendment at length. I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed at once to vote upon my amendment which involves a decision upon the part of the Senate as to whether or not the particular tariff items in this bill are to be removed from the scope of the study and inquiry, examination, and recommendation by the United States Tariff Commission when all other articles under the general law come within the scope of such examination and inquiry.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand from the terms of the bill, the provisions affecting these items are to be in effect for only two years. Is there any reason why they should not occupy the same basis as to Tariff Commission investigation as other items in the regular tariff bill?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly not. They should be subject to the same right of petition for revision and change as any other commodities covered by the tariff act.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator is correct about that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am glad the Senator agrees with me. I ask unanimous consent to have an immediate vote without debate.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, does the Senator's amendment cover the particular items in this bill on which the tariffs have been imposed?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It does. It eliminates the exclusion which these items have been given by this bill and, therefore, makes them subject to the general law.

Mr. HULL. Will the Senator indicate what his purpose is?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My purpose is to have these particular items upon which a special tariff is levied under this bill subject to the flexible provision of the general tariff law. Under the wording of the bill they are not now subject to the flexible tariff provision; they are removed and apart and can not be changed or modified by any recommendation of the Tariff Commission to the President. My amendment would permit their being treated like every other commodity upon which a tariff duty is levied.

Mr. HULL. Is it the Senator's view that the flexible provision should be made applicable to as many items as possible to which it does not already apply?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not know that I understood the Senator's question, but my amendment would put them in the same status, treat them the same as every other item that has a tariff duty, subject to petition for change and modification by the United States Tariff Commission.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I have no disposition to consume the time of the Senate at this time, but it does seem to me that we have had enough important legislation from the floor here, with no opportunity to investigate it. I have not had a chance even to look at the amendment, and no Senator has. I think it is bad policy to be heaping on so much legislation from the floor that necessarily is possibly more or less ill conceived.

I do not propose to object in this particular instance; but I am opposed to enacting important legislation from the floor with no opportunity for any of the Senators, much less any committee, to consider it.

I merely wanted to make that statement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do I understand that the Senator objects to this and desires to debate the amendment?

Mr. HULL. I have been objecting to all these tariff provisions, and I wanted to include this in my objection.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think I am in accord with the Senator's views on these tariff questions, and I think the Senator is in accord with my view in desiring that these tariff items in a revenue bill shall be treated like every other commodity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate must be in order. It is impossible to hear what is going on.

Mr. HULL. That was the point I raised with respect to this amendment—that we can not understand just what its true import is so long as we do not have a chance to read it and discuss it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am certainly opposed to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I know the Senator is; and I ask for a vote without debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, just a minute, please. I do not want to object to the Senator's request, but I should like to understand it a little more fully.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is the object: The rates in the bill apply only for two years. What it is desired to do is to strike out this provision, so that the rates in the bill shall fall under the flexible tariff provision.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do I understand that these rates apply only for two years?

Mr. SMOOT. For two years.

Mr. BINGHAM. And that is the reason why the Finance Committee and the House have not made them subject to the flexible provision of the tariff?

Mr. SMOOT. That was the object, Mr. President.

Mr. BINGHAM. If they were permanent rates, they would naturally go under the flexible provision, subject to change; but in order that there may be no misunderstanding about the possibility of increase or decrease in these rates for the next two years, the rates are fixed for two years, subject to no change by the Tariff Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the position taken by the House, and that is exactly the position we also took.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I rise simply to say that I hope the motion will prevail. I think these four items should be made subject to the flexible provision of the existing tariff law.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield for an inquiry?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. I notice that the present chairman of the Tariff Commission stated to the Ways and Means Committee recently that all the rates in the present law should be increased considerably. If this motion should be adopted, that would make it possible for the Tariff Commission immediately to increase the rates to which this motion applies; would it not?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Or, conversely, to reduce them the full 50 per cent. Personally, I think some of them ought to be increased the full 50 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to call up an amendment that was passed over, beginning at the bottom of page 145 and going over to line 10 on page 146.

If Senators will turn to that part of the bill, they will observe that paragraph (2), beginning with line 21 on page 145, is entitled "Reserve funds." I now offer an amendment to the committee amendment on page 146.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator already has an amendment pending at that point.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I will ask to have the Secretary state it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 146, line 1, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to strike out the words "such lower rate" and insert "the rate of 3¾ per cent."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to continue the base of taxation for life-insurance companies which has been established in law since the revenue act of 1921. The same principle was embodied in the bill when it passed the House, and the amendment which I now propose is the action first taken by the Senate Finance Committee.

It is my belief that the Finance Committee took the action which it did subsequently in reporting the amendment as it now reads, on the theory that there was a conflict of interest between large companies and small companies. Such is not the case.

For instance, in my own State there are six life-insurance companies. Three of these are small stock companies doing a nonparticipating business on a 3½ per cent basis. One is a small stock company doing a participating business on a 3½ per cent basis. One is a small mutual company doing a participating business on a 3½ per cent basis. One is a large mutual company—the sixth largest in the United States—doing a participating business on a 3 per cent basis.

Mr. President, I am not interested in trying to reduce the tax on life-insurance companies; but what I am concerned about is that the increased tax which is asked from these companies as their share of contribution under the present circumstances should, in so far as possible, fall equitably upon the various types of companies doing a life-insurance business.

Under the Finance Committee's amendment the greatest inequalities are introduced into the proportion of increased tax which these various types of companies are asked to bear.

I hold in my hand a table showing the comparison of tax under the present law based upon returns of 1931 business by 17 mutual life-insurance companies, compared with the tax under the amendment now proposed and under the bill as reported by the Finance Committee.

Under the bill as it stands, Mr. President, there is a variation in tax in these mutual companies of an increase on the one hand of 62.2 per cent, and on the other hand, extending up to 305.6 per cent increase in tax over existing law. It is absolutely impossible, and I admit it at the outset, to ask for an increased tax from life-insurance companies doing business on different kinds of reserve bases and to secure an absolutely equitable distribution of that increase in tax between the respective companies transacting business upon these various reserve bases. However, I submit that under the amendment now pending, the difference in these same 17 mutual companies would be an increase in tax of from 40.9 per cent on the one hand to 96.8 per cent on the other. In other words, we would secure the increase of tax—not as large a tax, I frankly admit, as the Senate committee amendment proposes—but we would secure a very substantial increase in such a manner that it would fall as equitably as is possible upon all of the various types of companies doing business upon these different reserve bases.

Mr. President, I consider this to be rather an important question; and had it come up at some other time, as I had hoped, I intended to discuss the matter at some length. It is a complicated question, and I admit that it is difficult to present the facts in a brief statement. However, what I wish to emphasize, and what I wish to appeal to the Senate to do, is to regard this increase in tax from the point of view of the policyholder and not from the point of view of the insurance company as such, for the reason that more than 76 per cent of the life insurance now in force in the United States is in mutual companies. The mutual companies, as entities, are merely operating trustees for their policyholders.

Here is the point, and I believe it an important one:

The proponents of the Finance Committee's recommendation have introduced into this discussion what I am, I believe, reliably informed to be an absolutely new term in insurance parlance. They talk about "free interest," Mr. President, and present a very plausible argument on that basis. But in so far as I have been able to ascertain, "free interest" is not mentioned in any recognized textbook on insurance. It is not mentioned in the statements filed as required by law by any life-insurance company in America. You can not dig down into the various component parts of the income or of the interest income of a life-insurance company and separate a part of it and say this is earmarked and is "free interest."

Mr. President, the important thing from the point of view of the policyholder is that he should be asked to pay a proportionate increase in tax; that we should not ask one policyholder to pay a very high increase in tax and say to another policyholder, because he happens to have taken out his insurance in a stock company, that he shall have a much smaller tax burden placed upon him.

Here is the essential point: Bearing in mind, as I have said before, that the mutual life-insurance companies of this country now have 76 per cent of the business in force, when a man takes out a policy in a conservative, well-run, 3 per cent basis mutual company, his initial premium is high, because that company, operating on a conservative basis, has set up a high factor of safety in fixing the premium. A man taking out insurance in a stock company pays a much lower initial premium. The only way in which the mutual company can compete with the stock company is to be in a position, after having carefully managed its affairs for its policyholders, that it may then return to them in the form of dividends or refunds—I care not what you call it—a sufficient amount to bring the mutual policy back onto a basis of competition with the stock policy. From the point of view of the Government, the basis which has existed in the law since 1921 has proved to be a sound basis. It has proved a reliable, steady source of income to the Government.

I should like to point out, for instance, just how the tax will work from the point of view of the policyholder.

Let us take an example, Mr. President. A life-insurance company agrees to pay $1,000 on the death of a policyholder. The company has only two sources from which to meet its expenses, including taxes, and to pay that obligation when it falls due, viz, premiums paid by the policyholder and interest received from investments. The test of equity lies in whether one method of taxation takes from the funds of one group of policyholders more than it takes from another group of policyholders. Obviously, if the deduction from the interest income of one group of policyholders is at a higher rate of percentage than the deduction from the interest income of another group of policyholders, equity will not be found. And that is exactly the result that would follow from the Finance Committee's amendment to the House bill.

Here is an example: Two men, each 35 years of age buy $100,000 of life insurance on the 20-payment life plan. One buys in the Provident Mutual of Philadelphia, an excellent 3½ per cent company. The other buys in the New England Mutual of Boston, an excellent 3 per cent company. Except for the interest rate they are identical.

The two policies are in force for 10 years and the facts are as follows:

Total reserve tenth year:
Provident policy (3½ per cent)	$23,200.00
New England policy (3 per cent)	25,578.00
Reserve invested to earn 5 per cent:
Provident earns on reserve	1,160.00
New England earns on reserve	1,278.90
Deduction present law 4 per cent, both companies:
Provident deducts	928.00
New England deducts	1,023.12
Taxable income:
Provident, $232 at 14 per cent tax	32.48
New England, $255.78 at 14 per cent do	35.80

The New England (3 per cent) pays a tax 10 per cent higher than the Provident (3½ per cent).

Deduct interest required (finance commission):
Provident deducts	$812.00
New England deducts	767.34
Taxable income (free interest, so called):
Provident, $348 at 14 per cent tax	48.72
New England, $511.56 at 14 per cent do	71.62

The New England (3 per cent) pays a tax 47 per cent higher than the Provident (3½ per cent).

I submit, Mr. President, in conclusion, that the only reason why Congress has established a policy of giving a different consideration to life-insurance companies in the matter of taxation is the fact that Congress wished to foster and help to develop the ownership of life insurance in the United States. Since 1921 a sound, equitable basis of taxation on all types of companies has been upon the statute books. Now it is proposed by the Committee on Finance, in the closing hours of the consideration of this bill, to upset that basis and to levy a tax which will be discriminatory in the weight with which it will fall upon the various types of life-insurance companies doing business.

May I say, Mr. President, that the life-insurance companies, like all other companies, have had to weather the present economic storm? I appeal to the Senate of the United States not to change at this time a basis of taxation which has proved equitable, and I ask the Senate to adopt the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senate Finance Committee had this matter up for discussion on two or three occasions, and the language now offered by the Senator from Utah for the Finance Committee reflects the well-considered and sound judgment of the Finance Committee.

The Senator from Wisconsin contends that the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah for the committee will increase the taxes of some of the large insurance companies, and he claims it is changing the basis of former taxation. It does change the basis, but the reason why it changes the basis is that a few great insurance companies in the United States have been escaping their just share of taxation, as compared with the smaller companies of the West and of the South.

Let me show what happens under existing law. Under existing law an insurance company pays the corporation tax, just like any other corporation, of 12½ per cent. When it comes to deducting for expenses, an ordinary corporation deducts for its actual expenses, whatever they may be. But in the case of life-insurance companies the law has allowed them to deduct a flat 4 per cent for reserve purposes, whether they actually spend that 4 per cent for creating reserves or not. What is the result? The result is that a 4 per cent reserve company gets a true deduction; it deducts 4 per cent, and it pays 4 per cent over to its reserves for the benefit of its policyholders. But when the law allows a 3½ per cent company to deduct 4 per cent, and exempt 4 per cent from its tax, when it is required to pay only 3½ per cent to its reserve, the law is giving it a one-half per cent interest on all of its investments absolutely free of tax.

When we allow a 3 per cent reserve insurance company to deduct from its income 4 per cent for reserve purposes, when it is required to pay only 3 per cent to create that reserve, we are giving that insurance company 1 per cent interest on all of its investment absolutely free from any tax whatever.

What has been the result? I take the 10 largest insurance companies in the United States. For the year 1927 they deducted from their income for taxation purposes $314,688,489.66. They deducted that on the 4 per cent basis on the theory that it was required for the maintenance of their reserves. They deducted that as an expense of their business.

Let us see how much they paid out in reserves. They paid out only $263,306,724. The result has been that they had $51,381,764 of income, the difference between the deductions allowed and what they actually spent, which means that they received $51,000,000 of income upon which they paid no tax whatever, and that tax, at the rate of 12½ per cent under the present law, means that the Federal Government lost $6,422,000 in income tax which ought to have gone into the Treasury.

What does the Senate committee bill do?

It allows every company, whether it is a big company or whether it is a little company, to deduct for reserve purposes exactly what it pays out in reserves. If it is a 3 per cent company, it is allowed to deduct 3 per cent. If it is a 3½ per cent company, it is allowed to deduct 3½ per cent. If it is a 4 per cent company, it is allowed to deduct 4 per cent.

Let me show just how that is. Suppose half a dozen corporations in some other line of business are to pay their income tax. One of them borrows money and pays interest on it at 8 per cent, another pays interest at 6 per cent, another pays interest at 4 per cent. Do Senators think they all should be allowed a deduction of 8 per cent? That is the proposition. Under the law on your personal income you are allowed to deduct from your income all money you pay out as interest. Suppose I pay 10 per cent, and the Senator from Massachusetts, because his credit is better than mine, pays only 6. Should he be permitted to deduct 10 per cent, when he has paid but 6? That is the question before the Senate now.

The question is whether we are going to let the 10 great, powerful life-insurance companies of the United States continue to enjoy a special treatment and a special privilege which the 3½ and 4 per cent companies out in the South and the West, the smaller companies, which are struggling for existence, do not enjoy. We are giving a premium to the large and the powerful companies. They have been enjoying it for years, and the Senator from Wisconsin wants to perpetuate that sort of a preference, because, he says, we are changing the basis of the taxation.

We are changing it. It has been wrong; it is not fair; it takes money out of the Treasury; and if Senators want the Government to obtain revenue, they will not vote for this amendment, because the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin would take out of this bill quite a few million dollars, and it would do a distinct injustice to the smaller insurance companies on a 3½ per cent basis.

I submit to the Senate, therefore, that the committee amendment ought to be adopted, because it allows each company to deduct its actual reserve requirements. If they be 3 per cent, and it pays 3 per cent over to its reserve, then it deducts 3 per cent. If it is a 3½ per cent company, it may deduct 3½ per cent, provided it actually pays out 3½ per cent to its reserve. If it is a 4 per cent company, it is allowed to deduct 4 per cent, provided it actually pays out that 4 per cent into the reserves.

What the Senator from Wisconsin referred to as "free interest" is just what I have been reading to the Senate. Free interest is the $51,000,000 annually which these companies take in that they are allowed to deduct, and yet they do not spend it on their reserves. The result is that they get $51,000,000 annual "free interest," which means free of taxes. That is where their word "free" comes from, $51,000,000 income free of tax.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it not true that in mutual companies the money is distributed and paid back to the policyholders, where with a stock company it is paid to the stockholders as earnings or dividends or profits?

Mr. CONNALLY. This provision includes all life-insurance companies.

Just one word more and I shall be through. In the year 1926 the life-insurance companies were permitted to deduct 4 per cent on their reserves, amounting to $213,000,000. That is what they deducted from their incomes. They paid out in reserves only $167,000,000. The difference in 1926 was $45,547,960, upon which they paid no Federal tax whatever.

Other corporations were paying taxes on their net incomes at the rate of 12½ per cent, but these 10 big companies were enjoying a preference which no other corporation in the country enjoyed.

What was the tax on them for 1926? For 1926 alone the tax at 12½ per cent on this "free interest" was $5,693,500.

In other words, for the year 1926 the Government lost $6,000,000 in taxes which ought to have been paid, and nobody on earth could get any advantage out of it except the big 3 per cent reserve companies, whereas all the other life-insurance companies were having to pay 4 per cent if they were 4 per cent reserve companies. If they were 3½ per cent companies they had to pay 3½ per cent and only got one-half per cent free interest, whereas the big companies were receiving 1 per cent free interest.

I ask the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I had a diagram large enough, I could show the Senate exactly what has been accomplished by the adoption of the amendment by the Senate. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has stated exactly the case. I have here a small diagram which I have prepared in the last few minutes. The large companies having a 3 per cent reserve are shown by the lower line. The 3½ per cent companies would come up to the line where the House fixed the rate. The 4 per cent companies go above the House limit in the proportion shown. The House said, "We will take a straight 3½ per cent."

What does that mean? It means just what the Senator from Texas said, that the 3½ per cent company is below the limit fixed by the House, and all the millions that they receive are not taxed. What the Senate did was to say that all shall pay 4 per cent, so that the big companies which pay 3 per cent are to be on exactly the same basis as the 3½ per cent and 4 per cent companies. Why should they not be on that basis?

That is the action the committee took and I do not see why there should be any objection to it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator tell us how many 3 per cent companies are mutual and how many are stock companies?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the figures to show how many.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it not true that all 3 per cent companies are mutual companies and the 4 per cent reserve companies are stock companies?

Mr. SMOOT. That does not change the situation in the least.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least. They are doing business in the same way, the rates are the same, they insure the same class of people; and why should they have any advantage?

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. As a matter of fact, the mutual companies hold the reserve on the theory that it is held for the policyholders, but they never distribute it to the policyholders, and while they are holding it they ought to pay a tax on it.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, the mutual companies divide these reserves occasionally. I am sorry to disagree with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], but the $51,000,000 that he speaks of belongs to the policyholders of the mutual companies, whereas the surplus of the other companies belongs to the stockholders.

May I explain just briefly the discrepancy? For instance, let me refer to the Connecticut Mutual: The Federal tax paid in 1931 was $74,000. Under the La Follette amendment that tax would be doubled almost exactly, $146,000. Under the Senate committee amendment it would be $288,000. The La Follette amendment brings about a 96 per cent increase in the tax, while the Finance Committee amendment brings about a 287 per cent increase.

The Equitable of New York is a good illustration. They have been paying and did pay in 1931 $1,081,000 of taxes. Under the La Follette amendment they would be brought up to $1,666,000, while under the Senate committee amendment they are brought up to $2,554,000. The La Follette amendment shows an increase of 54 per cent, and the Finance Committee amendment shows an increase of 136 per cent.

The Home Co.: The La Follette amendment shows an increase of 41 per cent, and the Finance Committee amendment of 92 per cent.

The Massachusetts Mutual: The La Follette amendment shows an increase of 49 per cent and the Finance Committee amendment an increase of 101 per cent.

The Phoenix Mutual: The Senate committee amendment would tax them more than five times the amount the La Follette amendment would tax them.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. How often do the mutual companies make distribution of the surplus?

Mr. WALCOTT. Every year.

Mr. DICKINSON. To what extent do they make the distribution—all they have?

Mr. WALCOTT. On the same basis that the directors of a company might distribute its surplus earnings in the form of dividends on the common stock.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is the very point. If we could impose a tax that would prevent their holding the reserve over from year to year, they would distribute it to the benefit of the policyholders. The way it is now they hold it over and through the strength of their company make unfair competition for other companies, when, as a matter of fact, if they held the reserve and paid a tax on it, they would not be able to show such profit in comparison with other companies.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALCOTT. I will yield the floor in just a moment.

Why is it not satisfactory to raise the tax 40 to 60 per cent instead of 200 to 300 per cent? The 200 to 300 per cent increase in tax proposed by the committee amendment is absolutely confiscatory and unfair. I personally agree with everything the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has said. I do not think he overstated the case at all.

My colleague from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] knows the situation, and I am sure will be able to add a bit of detail. The proposed increases would be a very unjust thing for the 3 per cent companies, which are mutual companies.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, as a matter of fact the discrepancy in taxation is a thing that has been helpful to the mutual companies. It happens that I am a policyholder in the Northwestern Mutual, of Milwaukee. I think one of the advantages they have had in competition with other companies of the Middle West has been the fact that they have been given the benefit of this tax exemption.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question? He said the committee amendment would increase the tax. I want to ask the Senator how the company which he mentions or any other company can be hurt if it is allowed to deduct from its net income all of its reserve outgo and every other company is allowed to do the same thing? How can there be any discrimination except to take away a preference which those companies mentioned by the Senator have been enjoying all these years?

Mr. WALCOTT. It is because the mutual companies are on a very low conservative reserve basis. They keep sound because they do not distribute all their earnings. They always follow a conservative policy, but they do distribute annually whatever they can afford and still remain on a financially sound basis. To tax them at the rate at which the committee amendment proposes is, it seems to me, absolutely unfair.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I arose a moment ago to answer the question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] as to what is done with the surplus funds accumulated by life-insurance companies. I know it is the practice among mutual life-insurance companies to retain approximately 10 per cent of their admitted assets as surplus to take care of depreciation and losses in securities. The balance of the earnings over and above so much as is required to maintain that 10 per cent surplus is distributed from time to time to policyholders.

There are three bases of reserve now in use among life-insurance companies. There are those which operate on the 3 per cent basis. They require the highest reserves. There are those which operate on a 3½ per cent basis. Then there are a very small number, negligible in fact, having not more than 5 per cent of the volume of the entire life-insurance business outstanding, which operate on a 4 per cent basis. For the purposes of this discussion we may well disregard the 4 per cent companies.

The 3 per cent company charges a larger initial premium than does the 3½ per cent company, because it has to have larger deposits to the credit of its reserves for purposes of accumulation. Of course that is obvious because the reserve after all is a sum of money set aside annually at interest at a given rate which, at the expiration of the policy, will amount to its face value and mature it. In other words, if one has a policy of life insurance of $1,000 and pays an annual premium, the insurance company will set aside a reserve each year which, accumulated at an assumed rate of interest, will amount to $1,000 when it is anticipated that policy will mature. When the rate of interest at which the reserve is to accumulate is 3 per cent, then, of course, a larger reserve is required to be set aside than when the rate is assumed to be 3½ per cent.

Let us analyze the operation of the provision now in the revenue bill as it affects the 3 per cent and 3½ per cent companies. We will assume that a 3 per cent reserve company has an investment income of $5,000,000. Under the present law there is a 4 per cent reserve deducted so that it will have a taxable income of $1,000,000. The 4 per cent company and the 3½ per cent company would likewise have a deduction of 4 per cent, and if their investment income were $5,000,000 each, they, too, would have a taxable income of $1,000,000; that is, the difference between $5,000,000 investment income and $4,000,000 allowable deduction.

But if we provide a deduction for the actual interest assumption for reserve accumulation, as in the pending committee amendment, we get this picture: The 3 per cent company with a $5,000,000 investment income will have a $3,000,000 deduction, and so it will have a taxable income of $2,000,000. The 3½ per cent company, with its $5,000,000 of investment income, will have an allowable deduction of $3,500,000, or 3½ per cent, and will leave it with a taxable income of $1,500,000. In other words, the 3 per cent company will pay 14 per cent on $500,000 in excess of that which the 3½ per cent company will be called upon to pay.

The idea seems to prevail here that the small companies are 3½ per cent companies. Of course, that is not so. Some of the very large companies are 3 per cent companies, but the fact is that the two largest life-insurance companies in the world are 3½ per cent companies. There is quite a number of small 3 per cent companies. There are many small 3½ per cent companies. On the other hand, there are large 3 per cent companies, and the largest of them are 3½ per cent companies. If the committee amendment is to prevail, then the largest life-insurance companies in the country will reap the benefit of its action, because they will have a decided advantage over the 3 per cent companies.

There has been some mention of free interest here. Mr. President, there is no such thing as free interest in a mutual life-insurance company. The excess interest over and above what is required to maintain the reserves of mutual life-insurance companies operating on the 3 per cent basis must of necessity be applied to the payment of dividends in competition with those companies which accumulate on a 3½ or a 4 per cent basis, as well as to meet the competition of companies operating on the stock basis.

I said at the outset that the 3 per cent company charges a higher premium than does the 3½ per cent company, and, of course, it accumulates a higher reserve. The benefit of that practice to the policyholder will be apparent when I say that throughout the existence of a policy of life insurance the 3 per cent company has a greater margin of safety to the credit of the policyholders than does the 3½ per cent company. In other words, at any given time during the existence of a policy of life insurance the 3 per cent policy will have a greater reserve to its credit than will the 3½ per cent policy, except at termination, when the reserve on both policies equals their face.

Again, it is an advantage to the policyholder to have the higher reserve to his credit because the surrender values, which are available at any given time under a policy of life insurance, are greater with the 3 per cent companies than they are with the 3½ per cent companies.

There is a considerable difference between the premium charged by the 3 per cent company and the one charged by the 3½ per cent company. Also, there is a margin of difference in the reserve of the 3 per cent company and the 4 per cent company; but bear in mind that, side by side with these mutual life-insurance companies are the stock companies, companies which operate for profit, companies which pay no dividends to their policyholders, any savings effected in the course of their business being paid to their stockholders as dividends. These stock companies issue what are known as flat-rate policies, and the flat-rate premium on a policy in a stock company, whole life, age 25, would be in the neighborhood of $14 a thousand, whereas the premium on a policy in a mutual company at the same age for the same amount of insurance would be in the neighborhood of $20. It must be apparent that the mutual company could never compete with the stock company if it could not return a sufficient amount of dividends to its policyholder so that the net cost of his insurance ultimately would be as low as, if not lower than, the cost in the stock company. So what has been referred to here as "free interest" is reserved by the mutual company for distribution among its policyholders as so-called dividends, and they must accumulate to a sufficient amount to enable the mutual company to meet the competition of the stock company on its flat-rate policy.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUTTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. This so-called free interest is returned to the policyholder. When he puts his money in a mutual company there is returned to him the excess over the expenditures and what is necessary for reserve, and it is not profit at all. Is not that so?

Mr. HEBERT. Of course mutual life-insurance companies are not profit-making organizations; they operate without purpose of profit, and whatever savings are effected by them are reflected in the cost of the insurance to their policyholders.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. This proposed amendment, it would seem to me, would tax that part of their income as though it were profit when it is not profit at all.

Mr. HEBERT. That would be true, and it would be true in a greater or less degree in proportion as the reserve is higher or lower in different companies.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it not also true, if the Senator will permit me, that the stock companies are taxed upon what constitutes a profit, from which dividends are distributed to the stockholders?

Mr. HEBERT. Under this bill the stock companies are taxed on the same basis as are the mutual companies, and so it makes no difference in either case whether there are profits or whether there are none. The tax is not based on profits; it is a uniform tax which is collectible and which accumulates whether the companies make a profit or whether they do not. It is not based upon profits at all; it is an arbitrary formula that is incorporated into the bill to provide a uniform taxation basis and a rather stable amount of revenue to the Government.

Assume two companies with equal amounts of insurance in force, let us say $100,000,000 for simplicity; assume that all the insurance is on the ordinary-life plan, issued at age 35, and has been in force 15 years. The reserve in the 3 per cent company would amount actually to $23,328,000; the reserve in the 3½ per cent company would amount to $21,915,000. So it will be seen that a lower reserve has been accumulated by the 3½ per cent company than is maintained by the 3 per cent company, because there is not so great an amount required to accumulate up to a given sum when invested at 3½ per cent interest as when the investment earns but 3 per cent. The investment income at 5 per cent interest on the reserve of the 3 per cent company would amount to $1,166,400.

The income on the reserve of the 3½ per cent company, again assuming the rate to be 5 per cent, would be $1,095,750. The 4 per cent reserve deduction now provided would leave the 3 per cent company a total income subject to the 14 per cent tax of $233,280, and the 3½ per cent company would have $219,150 subject to tax at 14 per cent.

On the other hand, take the same two companies with an interest deduction based upon the actual rate assumed for the accumulation of its reserves. In the 3 per cent reserve company the reserve would be the same as already stated, that is, $23,328,000; investment income would be $1,166,400; the deduction allowed at the actual rate of 3 per cent would amount to $699,840, leaving a taxable income of $466,560, whereas in the 3½ per cent company with deduction for actual interest assumption of 3½ per cent, it would leave a total taxable income of $328,725, or about $137,000 less.

So, Mr. President, I can reach no other conclusion from my study of the amendment as proposed by the committee than that the basis of taxation there provided would be inequitable as between the companies operating on different bases of reserve interest assumption. I think that a rate of, say, 3¾ per cent applying to all companies—and, of course, it would apply to the 4 per cent companies as well, but they are negligible, as I have already stated, only about 5 per cent of the entire insurance in force being in those companies—the 3¾ per cent deduction will be equitable, I believe, to all companies and will place them more nearly on the same basis for the purpose of taxation.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I assume that Senators have discovered by this debate that the real issue here is between the old and large insurance companies on the one hand and the younger and smaller insurance companies on the other. That is the real issue. There are three groups or classes of insurance companies in this country: The group of 3 per cent companies, which carry 3 per cent interest to their reserves annually, which group comprises many of the large companies; the 3½ per cent group, which includes one or two large companies, and a still larger number of lesser concerns; and the 4 per cent group, which comprises the younger and smaller insurance companies.

The amendment reported by the Senate Finance Committee treats the facts as they are and takes the facts as they are. The 3 per cent concerns it exempts 3 per cent, the 3½ per cent concerns it exempts 3½ per cent, and the 4 per cent companies it exempts 4 per cent. Is there anything irrational or unreasonable in a rule or policy which deals with the facts as they are?

The Senator from Wisconsin has stated that since 1921 all these companies—all three of these groups—have enjoyed or suffered a uniform exemption of 4 per cent. That 4 per cent exemption, as I am informed, was the result of a compromise. The compromise, however, did not stand up, owing to a decision of the Supreme Court.

I think I can illustrate the operation of the Senate committee amendment as contrasted with others. My illustration will not be technical, but I understand it is practical and it will illustrate the point. Take one of each of these categories; assume that each has a reserve of $10,000,000. The 3 per cent company realizes 3 per cent on the $10,000,000, or $500,000; it passes 3 per cent, or $300,000, to its reserve. There is a difference of $200,000. I call that "free interest."

The term is not technical, but it expresses the idea and describes the thing. The proposal is to tax this concern on its $200,000 of free interest. It is true that heretofore it has enjoyed an exemption of 4 per cent—while it passed 3 per cent to its reserve, it had an exemption of 4 per cent—but instead of paying a tax on $200,000 of "free interest," it enjoyed a special privilege and paid taxes on only $100,000 of its "free interest."

Take the 3½ per cent concern with $10,000,000 reserve lent out and yielding 5 per cent, or $500,000. It passed $350,000 to its reserve. It had free interest amounting to $150,000, you might say—net income, in a way. Under the existing law and the old rule it enjoyed an exemption of 4 per cent, or $50,000 more than its free interest; and, like the big concern, instead of paying on $150,000 free interest, it paid on only $100,000 free interest, the same as the larger on the 3 per cent concern.

Take the 4 per cent company. It had $10,000,000 yielding 5 per cent, or $500,000. It was granted an exemption of 4 per cent. It passed the $400,000 to its reserve. It had $100,000 free interest, and paid taxes on every dollar of its free interest.

So that the young, the small, and the struggling company that had only $100,000 free interest paid on every cent of it. The concern that had free interest of $150,000 enjoyed an exemption of $50,000, and paid on only $100,000 of free interest. The 3 per cent concern, enjoying an exemption not only of 3 per cent but of $100,000 additional, paid taxes on $100,000 of its free interest, enjoying an exemption on $100,000. So that each of these three concerns paid taxes on $100,000 of free interest. The big concern and the small concern paid, and paid alike.

Now, of course, as you know, the interest passed to reserve constitutes the fund that belongs to the policyholder. That is the reason it is exempt from taxation. That is the share belonging to the policyholder. The remaining portion belongs to the company, and ought to pay taxes.

The complaint that these concerns pay different taxes is well founded; and they will pay them under the Senate committee amendment. But assume that the United States Steel Corporation has a net income of $200,000,000 a year. Assume that the Bethlehem Steel Co. has a net income of $100,000,000 a year. Assume that the Crucible Steel Co. has a net income of $50,000,000 a year. Can the complaint be heard that a uniform rate on these three concerns would oblige the Steel Corporation to pay more taxes than it ought to pay? Is there any reason why the United States Steel Corporation should not pay a larger total tax on $200,000,000 net profit than the Crucible Steel Co. should pay on $50,000,000 of net profits?

Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin the arbitrary exemption will be three-quarters of 1 per cent, so that the 3 per cent concern will have a free interest of $200,000 and will have an additional exemption of $75,000 added to the $300,000 that it passes to reserve. It will pay on $125,000 free interest only. The 3½ per cent concern will pass $350,000 to reserve, and under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will enjoy an immunity of $25,000 more, which, added to its reserve exemption, will make its total exemption $375,000, so that it will pay on $125,000 exactly like the 3 per cent concern. But the 4 per cent concern has free interest amounting to $100,000, and under a flat rate of 3 per cent would not be allowed to take its total reserve, would not be entitled to $100,000. If it had to submit to three-quarters of 1 per cent it would have to pay on $125,000, too, although its free interest amounted only to $100,000.

That shows the discrepancy in this tax.

We are not subjecting these concerns to an arbitrary tax. We are simply withdrawing a privilege. In the past they have escaped taxation. That immunity is taken away by the Senate committee amendment. That is the complaint.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, a life-insurance policy is a contract; and that contract provides that a certain proportion of the premium paid shall be placed in a reserve fund. It has been the policy of the Government to relieve that reserve fund from taxation; but that is not all of the reserve fund.

In the contract there is an agreement, a guaranty to add to the reserve fund a certain rate of interest upon the reserve fund. Some policies guarantee to add to the reserve fund each year 3 per cent; and it has been the policy, and it should be the policy, to treat that 3 per cent added to the reserve fund just exactly as the reserve fund is treated so far as taxation is concerned. Other insurance companies agree to set aside 3½ per cent, and that 3½ per cent, when added to the reserve fund, should be treated in the same way, free from taxation. There are other companies that agree to set aside 4 per cent and add it to the reserve each year, and that 4 per cent should be treated in the same manner.

This amendment, however, provides that if it is a 3 per cent company not only will the reserve plus the 3 per cent guaranteed be relieved from taxation but that three-quarters of 1 per cent more on the reserve shall be relieved of taxation; and in the case of a 3½ per cent company it is provided there shall be one-quarter of 1 per cent on the reserve relieved from taxation, because the contract guaranteed to add only 3½ per cent.

It must be evident that if we want to treat life-insurance companies impartially, they should be entitled to freedom from taxes upon the actual reserve set aside, plus the guaranteed interest actually added to those reserves, and nothing more. That is the proper solution of this problem. If we want to provide, because an insurance company is a 3 per cent company, that three-quarters of a per cent additional upon its reserves shall not be touched by taxation, all well and good. But why should this be done? It is simply granting a special privilege, that is all. This amendment should be rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, first, this is not an issue between big and little companies. Secondly, the question at issue should be determined from the point of view of the policyholder. A man, we will say aged 25, buys insurance in three respective companies. If he gets a thousand dollars in a mutual 3 per cent company, his initial premium is $20.14. If he gets a thousand dollars in the Provident Mutual, a 3½ per cent company, the initial premium is $17.36. If he takes a thousand dollar policy in a 3½ per cent stock company, the Travelers, his initial premium is $14.72.

There is no such thing from the point of view of the policyholder as "free interest," about which Senators have been talking. The policyholder knows nothing about "free interest." He never heard of it. No insurance student ever heard of it until the debate came up and an attempt was made to introduce the committee amendment into the law.

From the point of view of the policyholder it is absolutely necessary that it should be possible for a company doing a business upon the 3 per cent reserve basis to pay back in the form of dividends to the policyholder—not to the stockholder—a sufficient amount to bring the premiums upon that policy down to a competitive basis with the stock or flat-rate policy.

Mr. President, we are not asking that no increased tax should be taken from these companies. We are asking the Senate in this situation not to impose a tax which is so inequitable in the manner in which it falls upon the various types of companies that it will increase the tax of one company 40 per cent, and of another company 305 per cent.

Therefore, it would be a dangerous thing for the Congress at this time, when the reserves of insurance companies have been suffering during the depression, to upset the basis upon which the tax has been based, and to call upon one company for such an indiscriminate contribution to the increased tax that is asked under both amendments.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator if he did not present those views and those arguments elaborately to the committee, and, after the most mature consideration, it did not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Mr. President; I do not think that is an accurate statement of the facts. They started out to get the actual mean reserve plus a quarter of a per cent. They did not get that, and then they adopted the amendment which is now in the committee bill. I do not think a majority of the members of the committee understood the action that was being taken at that time.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is on the committee; why did he not explain it to the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I endeavored to explain it to the committee; but I was always met by the fallacious argument that has been made on the floor here to-night, that this is an issue between big companies and little companies, and which, I submit, is not a fact.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. Under his amendment, I understand the so-called small companies would have no increase in their tax burden.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The 4 per cent companies, which do only about 5 per cent of the life-insurance business in the United States to-day, will have no increase in tax whatsoever.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All other companies will have their taxes increased, some of the increases amounting to 50 per cent of their present tax?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Correct. It is impossible to secure absolute equality under the increase in tax, but my amendment would secure a substantial equality in the percentage of increase of tax as to the various types of companies.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD some communications I have had on this subject.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
Boston, April 18, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I wish to lay before you the views of the New England Mutual Life Insurance Co. relative to House bill 10236, under which the taxes on life-insurance companies as a whole are doubled.

The rate of the tax has been increased to 13½ per cent, the same as other corporations, to which there can be no objection, but the base has also been so increased that the tax burden is not proportionate to other taxable corporations. At present the base is found by deducting 4 per cent of the mean reserves, and in the act as drawn this deduction allowed is reduced to 3½ per cent.

It was understood that there is no intention to tax the life-insurance companies more than will be enough to place them on the same basis as they were before the Supreme Court decided that nontaxable interest should not be included in the calculation. This the companies are willing to concede; and should the Government decide on a deduction of 3¾ per cent, the amount lost through this decision will be fully recovered.

There is a suggestion from some of the western companies to set the deduction at the amount required to maintain reserves plus one-fourth per cent. This may sound technical, but the result would be to so distribute the taxes that the burden would fall on the eastern companies, reserving on a more careful basis of 3 per cent, than upon the western companies, which reserve on a higher rate, and in some instances they would pay no taxes at all.

The Presidents' Association, of which the Massachusetts companies are members, are indorsing the petition for a deduction of 3¾ per cent, and I trust that you will feel that you can properly support this change in the bill.

The material that was used at the meeting held by the Ways and Means Committee is inclosed herewith, and will give you any further information in regard to the situation that you may desire; or, if not, I shall be happy to go into it further with you.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE WILLARD SMITH,
President.

BERKSHIRE LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
Pittsfield, Mass., April 18, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: The Federal revenue bill as passed by the House of Representatives carries a tax on life-insurance companies more than twice the present income tax.

Federal legislation has taxed life-insurance companies on their interest, dividends, and rents, allowing a deduction for investment expenses and a deduction of 4 per cent of reserves carried for policyholders. The reserves are retained for policyholders and are owned by the policyholders, who may take their share of the reserves at any time by surrendering a policy, or by taking out a policy loan. Because these reserves are not employed for the making of profits but were a fund designed for the protection of policyholders, the companies have been allowed a deduction from gross income of 4 per cent of the reserves; and because of the nature of life-insurance companies as not existing for profit, the rate of tax on net income has at certain times been 12 per cent, as contrasted with 13 per cent for mercantile corporations.

By increasing the rate of tax from 12 per cent to 13½ per cent and by decreasing the percentage of reserves to be allowed as a deduction from 4 per cent to 3½ per cent, the bill as passed by the House would require payment by the life-insurance companies of more than twice the present tax, and even in the present emergency this seems to us to unduly burden the companies.

In the case of our own company the tax would be more than double the Federal income tax which our company is paying this year.

While we all appreciate that an especial exigency exists this year, calling for great additional income for the United States Government, I trust that the percentages which would make the tax on life insurance more than twice what it is at the present time will not prevail, and that the deduction which is now 4 per cent, if it must be reduced, may be left at 3¾ per cent rather than 3½ per cent, as set forth in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives.

I know that you will give the matter your sympathetic interest; and if you decide that the House bill unduly burdens life insurance, I trust that you may favor a change which would prevent the institution from being unreasonably burdened.

I am, with kind regards, sincerely yours,

FRED. H. RHODES, President.

EFFECT OF PENDING FEDERAL REVENUE BILL ON LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Under the pending Federal revenue bill (H. R. 10236) the income-tax rate on life-insurance companies is increased from 12 per cent to 13½ per cent, as on corporations generally. In addition the method of computing net taxable income is changed so as to materially increase net taxable income as determined under the act without any corresponding increase in earnings. This is accomplished by reducing the present deduction of 4 per cent of the reserves to 3½ per cent. In other words, this change artificially increases net taxable income, although the corporation enjoys no actual increase in net income. We are not objecting to the payment of the same income-tax rate to be paid by other corporations. But we do protest against this proposed broadening of the tax base.

PROPOSED CHANGES WOULD DOUBLE LIFE-INSURANCE TAXES

This change in base (coupled with the increase in the rate) would more than double the aggregate income tax on life-insurance companies on the basis of 1931 returns. Under the measure as passed by the House, life-insurance companies would pay 212 per cent of what they now pay. Appreciating the necessity of balancing the Federal Budget and the desire of Congress to secure revenue sufficient for this purpose, there is no thought on our part to avoid our fair share of the necessary increase of taxes. The present law, by segregating just one portion of a life company's business and requiring the payment of tax whether or not the company actually earns a net income, puts the business in a strait-jacket such as is applied to no other business. For this reason, we submit, the proposed change will result, even in the face of the present emergency, in a disproportionate and unfair increase in the tax on life-insurance policyholders.

PRESENT METHOD OF TAXING LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

The net taxable income of a life-insurance company is determined by a formula, which produces a tax, regardless of whether or not the year's operation result in net earnings in the ordinary sense. In this respect the treatment of life-insurance companies differs from that of other corporations the net taxable income of which has a relation to the net income actually earned. Under the present act a life-insurance company may be required to pay a heavy tax in a year, or in a series of years, when the company actually earns no net income. Since the present method of ascertaining net taxable income was enacted in 1921, some companies have paid taxes in years when they earned no net income. This fundamental difference should be borne in mind in any consideration of the taxation of life-insurance companies. The present method does not favor life-insurance companies but rather the Government.

"GROSS INCOME" DEFINED AS INVESTMENT INCOME

Interest, dividends, and rents constitute the gross income of a life-insurance company under the present act. Premiums are not included in income, since they are in the nature of capital deposits to be subsequently returned to policyholders or beneficiaries. No deduction is allowed for ordinary expenses of doing business (other than investment expenses), nor for payments under policy contracts. No deduction is allowed for investment losses or bad debts, neither is gain from investments included as a part of gross income. If such items were allowed, the net taxable income would be materially altered from year to year and reduced for some years to come. The Government is highly favored by this exclusion.

PRESENT PLAN AVOIDS WIDE FLUCTUATION IN REVENUE

The purpose of Congress in 1921 in adopting this method of establishing the net taxable income of life-insurance companies was to avoid the wide fluctuations in net taxable income experienced in previous years, when the method of determining net taxable income was that applied to other corporations. This result has been achieved.

PRESENT PLAN AND TAX-EXEMPT INTEREST DECISION

The present formula, as enacted in 1921, provided for the deduction of 4 per cent of the mean of the reserve funds required by law (less tax-exempt interest from gross income). This deduction was arrived at by the Ways and Means Committee after careful consideration of all factors involved, such as the elimination of capital gains and losses, and disregard of whether or not the year's operations actually result in net income. It was the purpose not only to adopt a formula producing a dependable net taxable income but also one of simple nature and easily checked by the Government. This avoided many troublesome questions which had resulted in litigation under former acts. It was necessary to permit the deduction of interest on tax-exempt securities from gross income. To nullify this deduction the act of 1921 provided that the deduction of 4 per cent of the mean of the reserve funds should be decreased by the amount of such tax-exempt interest. This nullification of the benefits accruing from the ownership of tax-exempt securities was found unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court (277 U. S. 508). That decision struck from the act the provision of tax-exempt interest from 4 per cent of the mean of the reserves.

PURPOSE OF CHANGE TO OVERCOME SUPREME COURT DECISION ONLY

It is understood that the purpose of the Ways and Means Committee in making the change in the reserve deductions from 4 to 3½ per cent was to overcome the reduction in Government revenue on account of the United States Supreme Court decision in 1928 (277 U. S. 508). The effect of this decision was to give life-insurance companies the benefit of ownership of tax-exempt securities which previously had been denied.

CHANGE FAR MORE THAN OVERCOMES COURT DECISION—WOULD RETURN MORE THAN TWICE AMOUNT

Reports from 53 companies holding 84.8 per cent of the assets of all United States legal reserve, life-insurance companies show that the reduction in revenue to the Government on account of the Supreme Court decision at the new 13½ per cent tax rate aggregates $4,993,000 annually. (At the present 12 per cent tax rate it aggregates approximately $4,438,000 annually.) Reports from these same companies reveal that under the present law and the existing 12 per cent rate these companies will pay in 1932 on 1931 business $8,704,000 in Federal income taxes. The same companies would have paid $18,456,000 if the present bill with the 3½ per cent reserve deduction and the 13½ per cent rate had been in effect, or an additional tax of $9,752,000. In other words, the proposed change, instead of merely recouping to the Government the reduction in revenue on account of the Supreme Court decision, would actually more than double the tax on life-insurance companies, and thus recoup to the Government more than twice such reduction. It is submitted, therefore, that the change from 4 to 3½ per cent in the reserve deduction should not be allowed to stand in the bill.

If, however, in view of the expressed purpose of the Ways and Means Committee, it is intended that life-insurance companies be made to recompense for the reduction in Government revenue on account of the Supreme Court decision, some change in base is to be made, it is urged that such change be not more than necessary to restore such an amount. Inasmuch as the change in the reserve deduction from 4 to 3.5 per cent, as proposed by the pending bill, would result in a grossly excessive tax—an increase for the 53 companies from $8,704,000 to $18,456,000—it is respectfully urged that the present 4 per cent deduction be not reduced lower than to 3.75 per cent. On a basis of 3.75 per cent reserve deduction, the 53 companies referred to would pay an additional tax of $5,344,000, or more than the amount of the reduction in revenue from the Supreme Court decision.

Following are given income taxes of these companies under the present law and under the various bases herein discussed:

Data of 53 life-insurance companies which have 84.8 per cent of the assets of all United States legal-reserve companies

(Based on 1931 business)

Taxes on present basis (4 per cent deduction—12 per cent rate)	$8,704,000
Taxes that would have been incurred:
At 4 per cent deduction—13½ per cent rate	9,792,000
At 3¾ per cent deduction—13½ per cent rate	14,048,000
At 3½ per cent deduction—13½ per cent rate	18,456,000

ADDITIONAL POINTS RE H. R. 10236, LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANY TAX

Under present law, 12 per cent on all corporations and 4 per cent upon reserves as a deduction, the Massachusetts Mutual Life tax on 1930 business would be $358,000. With the increase of 1½ per cent, as on corporations generally, and preserving the 4 per cent deduction, the amount of tax would be $403,000 on the same income.

If the provisions in present House bill are mantained, with the 13½ per cent rate and 3½ per cent deduction, same income, the Massachusetts Mutual Life tax would be $642,748.

If the 13½ per cent rate is preserved and a 3¾ per cent deduction permitted, the Massachusetts Mutual Life tax would be $522,877.

This latter method of computing the tax is satisfactory to this company, and I can say that it is satisfactory to the other large Massachusetts companies—Berkshire Life, John Hancock, New England Mutual, and State Mutual. In the case of the Massachusetts Mutual this would be an increase in the present tax of about 43 per cent.

If deduction be on basis of 3½ per cent, as provided in House bill, the increase in Massachusetts Mutual Life tax would be about 70 per cent.

The Life Presidents Association went on record before the Finance Committee yesterday favoring the increase of 1½ per cent in the corporation rate; that is, from 12 per cent to 13½ per cent, and favoring 3¾ per cent in reserves deduction in place of 4 per cent as now permitted, and also in place of the 3½ per cent contained in the House bill. Figures were shown, which were not disputed, that on the basis of 3¾ per cent, with the additional 1½ per cent increase, the amount required to be recaptured by the Government to meet the loss from the National Life Insurance Co. decision would be more than satisfied. It is my belief that the Treasury Department would be in favor of going no further than the necessities require to recapture this loss. Company members of the American life covention, so-called, which is an association of a large number of mutual western, southern, and mid-western companies, most of which are stock companies and therefore profit-making institutions as differentiated from our Massachusetts mutual companies and most of the eastern companies, would have the deduction at a rate equal to the amount necessary to maintain the reserve, whether it be a 3 per cent requirement, 3½ per cent or 4 per cent, with the additional one-half per cent urged for some reason or other. It was stated at the hearing that on such a basis the amount of increase in taxes paid would not satisfy the necessities of the Government to restore the amount lost by reason of the National Life Insurance Co. That in itself is one answer to the American life convention suggestion.

Another answer is that the net result of such a provision would place the entire burden of increase of insurance-company taxation on the so-called 3 per cent companies; that is, those companies which maintain their reserves on an anticipation of 3 per cent earned. Those that are on a 3½ per cent basis would pay no more than now, and those on a 4 per cent basis would pay less than now, thereby making a very unfair distribution of the additional burden on the 3 per cent companies which are made up of the eastern companies, including most of our Massachusetts companies, and, as I have already indicated, would place the burden on the large mutual companies by transferring the added burden from the backs of stock companies who are profit makers. Mutual companies are owned by the policyholders, and the total additional burden of increase should not be placed on the policyholders. The Massachusetts companies alone have 424,000 policyholders in Massachusetts, and all companies are measured 1,286,000 plus, not including industrials, which are, of course, very much larger in number. The Massachusetts companies have 1,600,000 and all companies 5,283,000, in round numbers.

The Massachusetts companies in no way wish to avoid their part of the burdens which are necessitated by present conditions. We believe it is proper that the rate should be increased from 12 to 13½ per cent, and if it is necessary in order to obtain the money required to restore to the Government what it lost by the decision referred to, then 3¾ per cent on reserve deduction is sufficient and there should be no greater increase placed upon the policyholders, where it would finally rest.

If American Life Convention suggestion is adopted—that is, actual reserve interest requirement plus one-half of 1 per cent, Massachusetts Mutual tax would be $591,000.

WESLEY E. MONK,
General Counsel, Massachusetts Mutual Life.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. The revenue from this tax at the present time is somewhere in the neighborhood of $8,000,000. I have estimated, and I think pretty accurately, that under the amendment which is now under consideration the revenue of the Government would be nearly $15,000,000. So that there would be an increase of very nearly 100 per cent in taxation under the amendment we are now considering.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether it is not a fact that there are more 4 per cent companies than there are 3 and 3½ per cent companies?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Mr. President; that is not my understanding. My understanding is that the 4 per cent companies have in force about 5 per cent of the life insurance business in this country to-day.

Mr. HOWELL. That may be true; but the 4 per cent companies are the numerous companies throughout the Middle West which are growing up and developing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But under this amendment they will have the same exemption they have had under the existing law, which they would have under the committee amendment and under my amendment. If they are on a 4 per cent reserve basis, they will get a 4 per cent exemption.

Mr. HOWELL. But they will not have an exemption upon three-quarters of a per cent earnings of their reserves, as the 3 per cent companies would have.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The 4 per cent companies are treated the same under the existing law, the same under the committee amendment, and the same under the committee amendment as it would be amended by my amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. REED. Is not this the fact, that the 4 per cent companies are not complaining of the tax we have proposed to put upon them, because it is not at all increased? What they want to do is to increase the taxes on their competitors. Is not that the situation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Out of proportion.

Mr. REED. Out of all proportion to the treatment they themselves get.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Rhode Island suggested that there was a 100 per cent increase in the total tax under the Senator's amendment to the committee amendment. What is the increase in the tax, under the committee amendment, over the present law?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The increase, under the committee amendment, for the 17 companies, whose tax statement I referred to previously, is 108.2 per cent. The committee amendment, as I recollect it, is estimated to produce about $20,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator's amendment to the committee amendment would increase the amount about seven or eight million dollars?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Six million dollars above the existing law.

Mr. BARKLEY. While the committee amendment increases the total tax twelve to fifteen million dollars above the present law?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not over 12.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some tables which show the large amount of free interest which the big companies are receiving.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present a memorandum and have it printed at this point in the RECORD, which is an answer to the brief of the actuary of the American Life Convention.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

More than 75 per cent of all the life insurance in America is carried by mutual companies. More than 50,000,000 of our citizens are insured in these mutual companies. This insurance is divided fairly equal between 3 and 3½ per cent companies.

The statement prepared by the consulting actuary for the American Life Convention, has no logical or practical application to a mutual life-insurance company. It is a fallacy to apply the term "free interest" to mutual life insurance, or to suggest it as a tax base. In fact, there is no such thing as "free interest." (Memo., p. 8.)

Further, the American Life Convention committee does not want the Finance Committee amendment to become a law. They want and expect to get from the conference committee a modification if the Senate adopts the Finance Committee plan. Many of their companies are supporting the La Follette amendment. Every major 3½ per cent company supports it on grounds of equity. The Metropolitan, Prudential, John Hancock, Travelers, Ætna, Provident, Pacific Mutual of Los Angeles, Union Central of Ohio, Bankers Life and Equitable Life of Iowa, and many others indorse it.

The 3 per cent company is the conservative company of life insurance. By using the 3 per cent interest factor it is compelled to charge a higher initial premium than that charged by a company operating on a 3½ per cent interest factor, and, consequently, it has higher reserves. The result is that its interest income from invested reserves, because of the higher reserves, is greater than that of the 3½ per cent company.

The 3 per cent company, or any other participating company, must make a refund or dividend to its policyholders to bring its cost down to the approximate level of the company operating on a stock or nonparticipating plan. As a matter of fact, it sells its insurance under a promise to make such refunds, and its policies provide for them. It might be said that a company is not legally compelled to make such refunds. However that may be, on a competitive basis it would be forced out of business if it did not do so.

In the mutual company the premium which the policyholder pays, and the interest that the company earns on its funds, are the only moneys out of which it can mature its policy, pay the expense of operation, and, by dividends and refunds, reduce its net cost to the level of the nonparticipating or stock company.

The excess interest earning is one of the major factors in the ability of a mutual company to make such refunds or dividends. As the policy ages the excess interest becomes the outstanding factor in dividends or refunds.

As above stated, the 3 per cent company charges a higher initial premium, and brings its cost to a level that permits it to compete by refunds or dividends.

The 3½ per cent company charges a smaller premium because it assumes a higher rate of earning. It consequently is required to pay a smaller refund or dividend to bring its premium or net cost to the level necessary in competition.

The nonparticipating or stock company charges a fixed rate, with no refund or dividend contemplated, and consequently the initial premium is the net premium, and therefore materially lower than the initial premium of the 3 per cent or 3½ per cent participating company.

Let me illustrate: A man, age 25, buys a policy in three representative companies.

One thousand dollars in the Mutual Benefit, an excellent 3 per cent mutual company. His initial premium in that company is $20.14.

One thousand dollars in the Provident Mutual, an excellent 3½ per cent mutual company. His initial premium in that company is $17.36.

One thousand dollars in the Travelers, an excellent 3½ per cent stock company. His initial premium in that company is $14.72.

If these policies were bought in any of the other companies of these classes, the premiums would be about the same.

How long would the Mutual Benefit stay in business if it did not pay a dividend to its policyholder to bring its $20.14 premium to substantially the level of the Travelers' $14.72 premium? Also, the Provident Mutual must, by dividends, if it is to compete, bring its $17.36 to substantially the level of the Travelers' premium.

Where are these two mutual companies to get the money for these dividends? There is no place to get it except from savings and the excess interest earned over and above the amount required for reserve purposes. Again that excess interest is not "free" to be used as the management sees fit. The mutual company must pay dividends or refunds to policyholders or go out of business on a cost basis.

Another fallacy in the actuarial statement of the American Life Convention is the theory that a policyholder in a mutual company pays the tax on interest earnings rather than on the insurance which he owns. The fact is that the interest earning is a mere yardstick adopted for the purpose of measuring the tax that the policyholder, or the company for him, should pay. There is nothing sacred about this particular yardstick, nor is it in general use. Prior to 1921 it was not used by the Federal Government. It was adopted at that time as a convenient measure to stabilize income. It is now used by only two or three States, while other States base the tax on the reserves owned or the premium income of the company or some other base.

The policyholder is not particularly concerned with the formula by which the Government decides how much tax his company pays for him.

He knows that the cost of his insurance in the 3 per cent or the 3½ per cent mutual company is brought to the level of cost in the stock company by dividends and refunds. What he wants to know is how his tax compares with that paid by the policyholder in the other company.

He pays taxes on his insurance—not on "free interest," a thing he knows nothing about. If the tax on his policy of insurance is greater than that of his neighbor who is insured in another company for the same amount, there is discrimination.

The tables prepared by the actuary for the American Life Convention prove that the tax on the 3 per cent and the 3½ per cent policyholder is substantially equal if the deduction is level. They further prove that there is excessive discrimination against the 3 per cent policyholder if the deduction is the actual interest required.

TABLE A

Table A shows the ratio of taxable interest to "free interest," this new, mythical term in life insurance, under the House bill (3½ per cent deduction, uniform to all companies). It shows 75 per cent for the 3 per cent company; 100 per cent for the 3½ per cent company, and 150 per cent for the 4 per cent company, of which there are none.

Let us reduce it to understandable terms, using the figures the consulting actuary for the American life convention shows in his table, and find out what the policyholder who has a policy of life insurance in each of these companies pays. That is the test of equity and fairness. He shows that the policyholder in the 3 per cent company has $15.57 taxable interest; the one in the 3½ per cent company has $14.12 taxable interest. At 14 per cent, the policyholder in the 3 per cent company pays $2.18 in taxes on his policy of insurance, and the policyholder in the 3½ per cent company pays $1.98 on his policy of insurance. The policyholder in the 3 per cent company, stripped of all mythical and technical terms, pays 10 per cent more taxes on his policy than does the policyholder in the 3½ per cent company, on the basis of their own figures. Substantial equality though heavier on the 3 per cent policyholder. Remember the cost after dividend or refund is substantially equal and the maturity value identical.

TABLE B

Table B shows the ratio of taxable interest to "free interest" under the Senate Finance Committee amendment (the actual reserve rate of interest). It shows that each company pays taxes on 100 per cent of its "free interest," so called.

Again, let us strip it down to a commonsense basis and find out what it costs the policyholder in each of these companies to pay his tax on his policy of life insurance.

They show in their table that the 3 per cent policyholder has $20.76 of taxable interest, and the policyholder in the 3½ per cent company has $14.12 of taxable interest. At 14 per cent, the 3 per cent policyholder pays a tax of $2.91 on his policy of insurance, and the 3½ per cent policyholder pays a tax of $1.98 on his policy of insurance.

The 3 per cent policyholder pays a tax that is 47 per cent higher than the 3½ per cent policyholder, and the cost of the insurance to each is practically the same, and the benefit is identical.

TABLE C

Table C shows the ratio of taxable interest to so-called free interest under the present law. It shows the ratio in the 3 per cent company as 50 per cent, and in the 3½ per cent company, 67 per cent. (Four per cent omitted, as no new business is issued on a 4 per cent basis.)

Again let us strip it of mystery and look at it as a practical question. Each policyholder has a policy of life insurance that has, after dividends or refunds, cost him substantially the same amount of money and is worth at maturity, exactly the same amount.

The taxable interest of the 3 per cent policyholder is $10.38 and that of the 3½ per cent policyholder is $9.42. The tax of the 3 per cent policyholder at 14 per cent on his policy, is $1.45, and that of the 3½ per cent policy holder is $1.32. The 3 per cent policyholder pays 9 per cent more than the 3½ per cent policyholder, each owning a policy of insurance that cost substantially the same, and matures for exactly the same amount.

TABLE D

Table D shows ratio of taxable interest to so-called "free interest" under the La Follette amendment. It shows the ratio to be 62½ per cent in the case of the 3 per cent company, and 83 per cent in the case of the 3½ per cent company. (There are no 4 per cent companies.)

Now let us take that apart and see what it means when applied to two policyholders. They each own a policy of life insurance, they have paid substantially the same price for it and the maturity value is identical.

The taxable interest of the 3 per cent policyholder is $12.97, and of the 3½ per cent policyholder, $11.77. The tax at 14 per cent on the 3 per cent policyholder is $1.81, and that of the 3½ per cent policyholder, $1.65. Though the amount of insurance is the same, the cost is practically the same, and the value at maturity is identical, the 3 per cent policyholder pays a tax 9 per cent higher than the 3½ per cent policyholder.

What is the inescapable answer? Under the present law, under the House bill, and under the La Follette amendment (all level deductions) the tax upon each policyholder is substantially equal—a variation of 10 per cent or less.

Under the Finance Committee plan (actual interest) the tax is excessive on the 3 per cent policyholder—47 per cent greater than that of the 3½ per cent policyholder—though each owns the same amount of insurance, costing substantially the same, and maturing for exactly the same amount.

It is asserted in the actuarial statement of the American Life Convention that a comparison of taxes actually paid with insurance in force, total assets, gross income, and payments to policyholders, is irrelevant in determining an equal distribution of the tax. All of the above items are clearly set forth in all company financial statements and in all examination reports. They are accepted as a means of measuring the size and strength of various companies. It has never been the practice to measure the size and strength of a company or its tax-paying ability or obligation by so-called "free interest" which does not appear in any published reports of the companies. Why, then, should it be suggested as the measuring rod for Federal tax payments?

There should be a relationship between the tax paid and assets, business in force, and income. The actuary admits that total investment income is relevant. Based on every one of these items the 3 per cent policyholder pays more on his policy than the 3½ per cent policyholder.

This so-called "free interest" or "marginal interest," which is necessarily larger in a 3 per cent company than a 3½ per cent company, in the first place, is not a profit to the company at all. It is a cushion resulting from conservative operation, which acts as an extra safety factor against unforeseen contingencies and depression times. In the second place, this so-called "free interest" or "marginal interest" is the basis for refunds to policyholders to bring down the net cost of life insurance to a par with 3½ per cent and nonparticipating companies.

To measure the tax on life insurance companies in proportion to so-called "free interest" would be the same as putting a higher automobile-license tax upon the owner of a car which has 4-wheel brakes than one who owns a car having only 2-wheel brakes.

Actuaries sometimes differ as do lawyers. For instance, there is quoted below a telegram from Mr. John K. Gore, vice president and actuary of the Prudential Insurance Co. of America, of Newark, N. J., the second largest company in the world—a 3½ per cent company—which unreservedly indorses the La Follette amendment whose reserves are based on 3½ per cent.

JAMES LEE LOOMIS,

Hotel Washington, Washington, D. C.:

The Prudential believes that the provision in the present law for a uniform percentage of reserve to be allowed as deduction from interest earnings in order to arrive at taxable income for life insurance companies is the most equitable plan. We therefore favor the La Follette amendment providing for a uniform rate of 3¾ per cent except where reserves are actually carried at 4 per cent. We believe that basing the deduction on the valuation rate discriminates unfairly against companies valuing at 3 per cent, and would impose a tax upon such companies out of all proportion to the tax paid by companies such as the Prudential, whose reserves are based on 3½ per cent.

JOHN K. GORE,
Vice President and Actuary,
The Prudential Insurance Co. of America.

Mr. Gore is an actuary with a nation-wide reputation. His company is a 3½ per cent company and it pays a very sizable amount of taxes. On its 1931 business it paid a Federal tax of $1,033,000. Under the La Follette amendment it would have paid $1,972,000. It supports that amendment, as Mr. Gore says, because the level deduction is the "most equitable plan."

Other leading 3½ per cent companies—big and small, stock and mutual—take the same position as Mr. Gore.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the roll is called I want to say that I have here a tabulation which has a bearing upon this subject, and I ask unanimous consent to have it put in the RECORD.

I do not desire to discuss the question more than to say this: That this particular provision of the tax measure gave me a considerable degree of anxiety. I studied it as carefully as I could, and I reached the conclusion that the amendment which the Senator from Wisconsin has offered comes nearer to doing justice between the reserve companies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia for the insertion in the RECORD of the table to which he has referred?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is necessarily absent. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, after line 16, insert a new subsection, as follows:

(f) There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the amount of income derived through the willful violation of the criminal laws of the United States or of any of the States or Territories thereof a tax of 100 per cent of such amount. The tax imposed by this subsection shall be in lieu of all other taxes under this title in respect of such amounts.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I have been asked to explain the amendment.

Through very efficient and thorough and painstaking investigations by the Internal Revenue Department and the Department of Justice, centered in the Middle West and particularly in the city of Chicago, there have been revelations of huge incomes through deliberate, willful violations of criminal laws of certain States and of the Nation. These are not small matters, but run into net incomes aggregating millions upon millions of dollars, not to one or two persons, but to one syndicate after another, not for 1 year, but for 4 or 5 or 6 or 7 years last past.

The criminal violations out of which these stupendous incomes have been realized are not through the violation of a single criminal law, but through the deliberate, systematic violation of one criminal law after another. Huge incomes have come to citizens and aliens resident in this land from the systematic and thorough organization of white-slave rings, through the organization in large territories of dens of vice and iniquity, through organized gambling syndicates operating in every line, through the violation of every law against gambling—race tracks, policy games, roulette, faro, and all the lines of gambling which have robbed the common laboring men of many of the cities of our land of their wages.

The incomes referred to have come through violations, reaching from coast to coast, of the laws providing for the enforcement of prohibition in this land. There have been disclosures of beer rings, liquor rings, huge profits revealed upon trials unquestionably running into millions and millions of dollars through the sale of liquors and narcotics illegally, and reaching into every line of criminal activity and criminal endeavor.

After these agents have investigated and have uncovered and disclosed these huge profits of great syndicates thoroughly organized, some portion of the illicit gains have been obtained for the Federal Government. The great cry which has gone up among the law-abiding people of the Middle West and of our State and of our great metropolis particularly, is that it is not a line of business and endeavor in the profits of which the Federal Government should share.

I propose by my amendment to change the position of our Government from that of a partner in the profits of these great criminal activities to something entirely different. Instead of sharing in the profits of illegitimate business as we do in the profits of legitimate business and industry and law-abiding persons, instead of placing the Government upon the same basis of a partner in these illegal profits, I propose to change the situation which has caused so much criticism of our Government. Instead of saying that the Federal Government shall be a partner in rum running and beer rings and narcotic selling, gambling, and prostitution and other kinds of vice, I propose that the Government shall confiscate every dollar of such profits if they can be reached—an entirely different attitude and, it seems to me, a sound attitude for the Government to take.

The effect of this amendment will be twofold. First, it would change the position of our Government from that of a partner in vice and crime to that of a confiscator of the profits of vice and crime. Secondly, it will put those who look with some degree of hope for profit through vice and crime and the deliberate violation of the criminal laws in a position where they will pause and hesitate, knowing that they are between two fires; that if they violate the law they must report their earnings and then those earnings will be taken from them 100 per cent; and if they do that, then, of course, there is no financial object in violating the law. Secondly, if they do not report those earnings, and they are discovered, they will be subject to Federal prosecution and to a term in the penitentiary.

Will it not have the twofold tendency of deterring and stopping crime in the first place? And, secondly, and perhaps more important, will it not put our Nation in a better and more honorable and higher position, changing it from the position of one who now shares in the profits of crime to one who is no longer a partner with the criminal but is a confiscator of all the profits received through such sources?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I read the amendment, though I may not have interpreted it correctly, if some person in the State of Illinois or in the State of Iowa violates a license law or the ordinance of a city which forbade him selling potatoes or what not without a license, and he was fined $100 by the magistrate's court for the violation of the ordinance, or even of a State statute, then under the Senator's proposed amendment he would also be fined $100 by the Federal Government. Would not that be the effect of it?

Mr. GLENN. No; in that instance if that were construed as a criminal law, if he made a dollar upon the potatoes which he sold, he would have to report it to the Government and pay it a dollar.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, Mr. President, he could not make a dollar on a sale of any agricultural product. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLENN. I do not think he could. If he did so, I think he would be entitled to a medal! [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I just want to say that it seems rather an innovation in our form of government to combat crime through the means of an income tax. It may be well to do it, but it is the first time we have undertaken it. We will get the tax now wherever the income is discovered. I do not see what advantage we are going to have over the plan we already have. Whenever we discover income from crime in any way as outlined by the Senator, we get the tax now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no, Mr. President; under the present system we take the same tax from the criminal that we would from legitimate business. The proposal of the Senator from Illinois is to make crime unprofitable by confiscating all the earnings of crime.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, instead of being a partner, we will take it all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and thus leave no premium on crime.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer, the last one I shall present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 254, line 22, after the word "thereof," insert:

Except waters exploited and advertised to the medical profession exclusively.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to exclude from the tax those mineral waters which are not used as beverages but which are prescribed as medicine by the medical profession. There are only a few of them. They are not beverages, and they are not properly included here. The practice of the department in the past has been to consider them as medicinal preparations. For instance, speaking of one of these waters the Treasury Department two years ago said: "It is clearly a medicinal preparation and not a beverage." I am asking that these waters which are prescribed and which are exploited and advertised exclusively to the medical profession and used as medicine shall be excluded from the operation of the tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this same amendment was presented to the committee, and it was decided not only by the department but by every member of the committee that it was absolutely impossible of adoption.

I beg of him to take the matter to conference, and if the conference decides as the Senator has stated I will be entirely satisfied.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 248, line 14 after the word "section," it is proposed to insert "or section 602, relating to the tax on tires and inner tubes."

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 264, line 16, after "etc." it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "or section 602, relating to the tax on tires and inner tubes."

Mr. SMOOT. That is the same amendment in a different place?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 316, after line 5, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. —. The second sentence of the second paragraph of section 23 of the merchant marine act, 1920, as amended, shall be construed as applying solely to the basis for determining gain or loss from sale or other disposition.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Utah realizes the purpose of that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not accept that amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I misunderstood the Senator. I thought he said he was willing to accept the amendment. I have talked to him about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that, if I understood the reading of the amendment correctly to-night, there has been some little change made in it since I saw it; but if the Senator desires, I will let it go in the bill so that it may go to conference, but I can not say that it will be retained in the bill.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, that is all I can ask for at this time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the amendment, I think, is wholly unfair. In substance, it provides that if I own an old ship and sell it and invest the money in a new ship, while transaction is nontaxable under the present law, the amendment provides that the basis for depreciation on the new ship is not my original investment but the price paid for the new ship. It "jacks up," so to speak, the basis for depreciation, without there being any taxable transaction in the meantime.

Mr. BULKLEY. I submit that the intent of the merchant marine act was to encourage investments in new ships exactly in that way. The amount of depreciation on the new ship is exactly the same, whether the income tax was paid on the sale of the old ship or not. This simply makes clear that intent. I hope the Senator will not object to it.

Mr. REED. I do not care to prolong the debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I call up the motion entered by me to reconsider the vote by which the Senate rejected the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] exempting from taxation admissions to the spoken drama when the charge is under $3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 269——

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah understands that amendment, but perhaps I can explain it quicker than it can be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WAGNER. It was rejected by a very close vote, and a number of Senators since have informed me that they did not understand the question.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will ask for a reconsideration of the vote, I am willing to take the amendment to conference.

Mr. NORRIS. I object to a reconsideration.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the vote whereby the amendment was rejected may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the motion as soon as the amendment has been read.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, who has made the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] entered the motion and made the motion. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 269, line 2, after the word "imposed," it is proposed to strike out the period, insert a colon, and add:

Provided, That in the case of legitimate spoken drama, if the amount paid for admission is less than $3, no tax shall be imposed. As used in this subdivision, the term "legitimate spoken drama" means a spoken play, whether or not set to music or with musical parts or accompaniments, which is a consecutive narrative interpreted by a single set of characters, all necessary to the development of the plot, in two or more acts, the performance consuming more than 1 hour and 45 minutes of time.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. WAGNER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to inquire if the Senator from Texas who makes the motion voted with the prevailing side?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I voted in the affirmative.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I want to be heard. Mr. President, we discussed this proposition quite fully. It is not true that there were just a few Senators here; we had a roll call; the question was debated on both sides at considerable length, much longer, it seemed to me, than the merits of the question would warrant. Now it is proposed to do it over again.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. I was going to suggest that, without going through another discussion, we have a roll call upon the question as to whether the vote will be reconsidered. I do not want to delay further the disposition of this question.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the question I am debating. I think I understand the parliamentary situation. There is pending a motion to reconsider; it is debatable, and that is what I am talking about.

It seems to me, Mr. President, when we have once given the consideration which we gave to this question, at this late hour, when we are about to finish our work on this bill, which everybody is very anxious to get through with, that we ought not to waste our time discussing and revoting on and reconsidering amendments of this kind. It has had its day in court; it has had full discussion; and now it is proposed, after we have levied a tax on the little fellow who buys a ticket for 50 cents in order to go to a movie show or to any other kind of a theatrical performance, to relieve from any tax whatever those who are able to pay up to $3.

I myself can not understand why, if one is willing to pay $3 for an admission ticket to a theater, he should be relieved of a tax on it and that we should tax, to the extent of 10 per cent of the admission charge, the man or the boy or the girl who buys a 50-cent ticket.

I do not want to go over the debate again; but, Mr. President, if it is proposed to take up questions of this kind there will be no getting through the bill. There are many other amendments which we have rejected and which are more important than this, but now it is desired to reconsider and debate over again the proposition of levying a tax upon a man who is able to buy a ticket that cost $3. I am not going to debate it now; I simply want to state the proposition; but I do wish to say that if the vote is reconsidered I shall consider it my duty to go into a discussion of it again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was rejected.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. WAGNER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. There have been many motions entered to reconsider votes taken. Evidently many of them will not be called up for action. What will the record show as to their disposition?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The record should be cleared up; they should all be disposed of by being withdrawn without objection, which can be done, or by being acted upon.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish to call up a motion I made to reconsider the vote on the amendment on page 281, section 726, the stamp tax on sales of produce for future delivery. I wish to make a brief statement about it.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House put in this provision to raise the tax from 1 cent per $100 worth in future trading on farm products to 5 cents per $100 worth. That was for two years. The amendment was stricken out by the Finance Committee. There appeared before the Finance Committee, it seems, three or four grain men and one cotton man in opposition to this provision of the House, but no expert from the Agricultural Department appeared, so far as I can ascertain, before the Finance Committee of the Senate. The expert from the Agricultural Department informed me that 95 per cent of the so-called future trading in farm products is purely speculative, and a 5 per cent tax per hundred dollars would tend to minimize such trading; and I believe it should be minimized.

In 1928, when the tax bill was before this body, there was an amendment offered to impose a tax of 50 cents per hundred dollars, which would have meant the cutting out of future trading. That might have been a little high; but I believe that a 5 per cent tax would raise revenue and would also tend to minimize future trading.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. I think I remember, but I should like the Senator to inform the Senate, if he can, about the amendment providing a 50 per cent tax.

Mr. FRAZIER. The amendment provided a tax of 50 cents on a hundred dollars' worth.

Mr. NORRIS. That was agreed to by the Senate, was it not?

Mr. FRAZIER. No; it was voted down.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator another question: Was that an amendment to the so-called Caraway bill, or was that an amendment offered by the late Senator Caraway?

Mr. FRAZIER. It was.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senate agreed to it.

Mr. FRAZIER. No; it was voted down, but there were twenty-some votes, as I remember, for the amendment. Of course, the rate on that was so high that it would have, in effect, cut out the future trading, and that was the late Senator's object in offering the amendment; but that is not the object of this amendment.

The complaint was made before the Committee on Finance that any tax on futures would be charged up to the producers of the cotton or the grain. That is true only in case of cooperative organizations; and if this reconsideration is agreed to and the Senate committee's amendment is stricken out, I have an amendment prepared which will exempt cooperatives which qualify under the Capper-Volstead Cooperative Act from paying this tax.

Mr. President, sometimes in the Chicago Board of Trade there have been as high as 400 to 1 speculative grain transactions. In other words, where they have only actually bought 50,000,000 bushels of wheat, they have bought and sold as high as 20,000,000,000 bushels, or four hundred times as much as they actually bought of wheat on that market. In the cotton markets, when there have been fourteen or fifteen million bales of cotton produced in the United States in the year, they have sometimes bought and sold in the speculative market as high as 200,000,000 bales of cotton.

We have been advised by the Farm Board and the Agricultural Department to cut down production; and yet when the farmers of the wheat States take their wheat on the market in the fall of the year, the short sellers will come in and sell as much in short sales as the farmers produce. It has the same effect as it would if the farmers produced the additional millions of bushels of wheat that are sold short on the market; and that forces the price of wheat down.

We have had cases where in two or three days the market has broken as much as 15 or 20 cents because of the short selling on the market. There should be a curb on this short selling, and this 5-cent tax will bring about that curb.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate on this matter. I could talk a long time on it, but I should like to see this amendment reconsidered, and the House provision reinstated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes.

Mr. REED. I myself know nothing whatever about trading in grain, but we were told in the Finance Committee that it is necessary for the millers of wheat to protect themselves by making contracts for future delivery. Is that so?

Mr. FRAZIER. Under the existing conditions they do what is called hedging, but according to experts of the Agricultural Department, only 5 per cent of this so-called future trading is legitimate hedging, and they say that that is a very conservative estimate.

Mr. REED. Is it right for us to put a tax on that legitimate hedging?

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course it is not absolutely necessary for the millers to hedge; that is, when they buy a lot of wheat when it happens to be low, and they think it is going to go up, and then they hedge. If they want to buy the wheat and make it into flour and sell it as they go along, they do not need to hedge. It is just a speculative feature.

Mr. REED. Otherwise, do we not make a gambler in wheat out of every legitimate miller?

Mr. FRAZIER. Oh, no; I would not say that. Of course, the intention of the agricultural bills that are on the calendar now is to tend to stabilize the market of grain and cotton. If that is done, it will do away or largely do away with the necessity of hedging. It will also do away with the future trading to a large extent.

Mr. REED. We have been trying to stabilize it for a long time, but we have never accomplished anything.

Mr. FRAZIER. I know, but the gamblers have been too strong for us.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have before me the statement of Siebel Harris, representing the Grain Committee on National Affairs, Minneapolis, Minn.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to say that the Grain Committee on National Affairs represents the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis and the other grain centers.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what the testimony was, and why the Senate committee took the action that it did; and, if the Senator desires me to do so, I can read some more testimony before the committee on the same subject that was not from Minneapolis; but this was the substance of it:

> Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am speaking as chairman of the Grain Committee on National Affairs in opposition to the proposed increase of tax on sales of produce for future delivery, under section 726.
> This committee, representing 11 of the leading grain exchanges of the United States and the Grain and Feed Dealers' National Association, desires to protest vigorously against the proposed increase in the tax on sales of produce for future delivery which would increase the tax rom 1 cent or each hundred-dollar value to 5 cents for each hundred dollars. We firmly believe that such an increase would constitute heavy and entirely unwarranted burden on the producer at a time when his condition is already one of extreme distress. It seems inconceivable that Congress should add such a burden to the farmer's woes in view of the fact that Congress has appropriated many millions of dollars for the relief of agriculture and the betterment of the farmer's situation. It is true that the farmer would directly pay a tax only on the amount of grain which is hedged, but under the present machinery of futures markets he would also be subjected to an indirect burden because of the increased difficulty in hedging. The proposed tax would be so heavy that it would greatly hamper the course of trade which makes for a liquid market. This would inevitably increase the cost of hedging, which in turn would be reflected back to producers and consumers alike.

I do not think there is any need of my reading the testimony of other representatives of the Grain Committee on National Affairs.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this man is one of the leaders of the grain-gambling crowd on the Minneapolis Grain Exchange.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know why the Senator says that.

Mr. FRAZIER. Why, he says he represents 11 of the leading grain exchanges in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say that his testimony here is not correct?

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course I say it is not correct. It is correct from his viewpoint, from the viewpoint of the grain exchanges. They are all opposed to this. They want to gamble. They make more money manipulating the market than the farmers do who raise the wheat.

Mr. SMOOT. Then there is Mr. Cain, representing the Grain Committee on National Affairs of Jacksonville, Ill.; and I could go on and give the statement of the president of the New York Cotton Exchange, Mr. Weld.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, let me ask whether there was any testimony from the Grain Futures Administration of the Department of Agriculture or from the Federal Farm Board?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember anyone from the department or the Farm Board coming before the committee.

Mr. CAPPER. I think we ought to have somebody from the Agricultural Department representing the producer.

Mr. SMOOT. They had a chance to come before the committee. They knew the subject was up. They knew what the House had done in the matter.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, it seems to me just a little strange that the Finance Committee, when a measure of this kind was before them and they were holding hearings, did not call in anyone, or listen to testimony from anyone except the grain and cotton gamblers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that we did not call in any witnesses. The witnesses came voluntarily.

Mr. FRAZIER. That is all very well; but the experts from the Agricultural Department here might have come in.

Mr. COUZENS. Did they appear before the House committee?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; they did.

Mr. President, a charge of one-eighth of 1 per cent per bushel is made on future sales by the grain exchanges, by the commission men, and a charge of 1½ cents per bushel is made on sales of actual wheat. I want the Members of the Senate to get that. The farmer who sells a carload of actual wheat is charged by the commission firm 1½ cents a bushel, regardless of the price of the wheat. That has been the rule of the chambers of commerce and the grain trade since 1920; but the speculator who buys or sells a thousand bushels of wheat in futures is only charged one-eighth of 1 cent per bushel. The unfairness of it is obvious. It is entirely in opposition to the welfare of the farmer. They manipulate the markets for the benefit of the grain trade and not for the benefit of the producer.

This tax is legitimate. It should be put in the bill; and I think it should be higher than it is.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, we have imposed a tax upon transactions on the stock exchange. We have imposed a tax on admissions to race tracks, where so-called horse-race gambling is indulged in; and I can not see now why we should permit the grain exchanges to go free.

Selling futures on the grain exchanges is nothing more nor less than selling short on the stock exchange. I agree with the Senator who has just spoken on the subject that as a matter of fact it is really very detrimental to the interests of the agricultural people of the country—the producers. I know of no better source from which we may derive some revenue than to impose this tax upon the selling of futures on the grain exchanges.

I think we should adopt the policy we have adopted in regard to so-called gambling on the stock exchange and, as I have already stated, the so-called gambling at the race tracks. Why should we exempt the grain exchanges?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to reconsider the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer to the language of the House text which will exempt cooperatives from the payment of the tax. I send it to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota offers the following amendment:

On page 281, line 15, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: but the additional tax provided for in this subsection shall not apply in the case of any sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell by any cooperative association qualified under the act entitled "An act to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products," approved February 18, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and myself, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from New Mexico, on behalf of himself and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], offers the following amendment:

On page 262, after line 2, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. —. EXEMPTION OF ARTICLES MANUFACTURED OR PRODUCED BY INDIANS

"No tax shall be imposed under this title on any article of native Indian handicraft manufactured or produced by Indians on Indian reservations or in Indian schools, or by Indians under the jurisdiction of the United States Government in Alaska."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received a letter from the Secretary of the Interior strongly indorsing this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Utah? I desire to call up my motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment at the bottom of page 286 was adopted. I understand that the Senator from Utah does not object to that.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the cigarette-papers amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not any objection to reconsidering that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PART VI—TAX ON CIGARETTE PAPERS

SEC. 751. TAX ON CIGARETTE PAPERS

Section 402 of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by inserting after "importer" a comma and the following: "or removed for consumption or sale," and by striking out "more than 25 but."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there seems to be a misunderstanding, so I am told by a number of Senators, on the vote that was taken. Many of them say that they voted under a misapprehension. Therefore I said to the Senator from Kentucky that I was perfectly willing to have the amendment reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate to discuss this matter, but this is a tax placed by the committee amendment on small packages of cigarette papers given away with packages of smoking tobacco. The tobacco bears a tax of 18 cents a pound, which is about six times as much as the farmer gets for producing it. It involves quite an important industry that affords a market for tobacco which is very much depressed.

The income derived from it is so small that the Treasury could not even estimate it. We have balanced the Budget, and eliminating this amendment will not unbalance it. I hope the Senate will agree to its elimination in behalf of those who are not able to buy expensive manufactured cigarettes, but who do enjoy the exhilaration of a smoke obtained from a cigarette they affectionately roll with their own fingers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the reason why the committee adopted this amendment was that it was found that these tobacco companies are frankly evading the law. We gave them a limitation of 25 sheets, which they could pack in one book, and give it away, and that would be free of tax, and for a time they put a package of 25 sheets in the wrapper of the cheap tobacco. Now they have begun to evade that by putting in two books containing something less than 25 sheets each, but actually giving away with each package of tobacco more sheets than the law allows to be given free in a single book. It was such an obvious evasion of the intent of the Congress that the committee thought the only just thing was to tax all cigarette papers alike, no matter how many sheets were in each package.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit right there, of course it may be questionable whether the United States Government ought to levy any tax on a free package of cigarette paper given away with a package of tobacco; but it certainly seems to me an injustice to provide the possibility of taxing a little package of free paper given away, whether it contains 5 sheets or 10 sheets or 2 sheets. Under this amendment we would tax a package containing two sheets, which would enable a man to roll a cigarette made out of tobacco bought in packages. The income derived by the United States Government from tobacco is $450,000,000 a year, which is three times as much as all the farmers of America obtain for producing that tobacco, and that is all this Government ought to expect out of this one industry.

Mr. REED. We tax the package of matches which are given away free.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; under this bill we tax wooden matches, but not the little books of matches given away with tobacco.

Mr. REED. My understanding of the bill, in the shape in which we find it, is that those are taxed half a cent a thousand.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not understand that paper matches are taxed at all.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Even so, that is quite a different proposition from taxing a package of papers that are made in the United States.

In the first place, it is an important industry in the United States. It affords a market for tobacco, which is very much depressed in price now, and it is very doubtful whether there is any income to be derived from it, because either those who buy the tobacco in packages must receive less tobacco or they have to pay more for a 5-cent package of tobacco.

Mr. REED. The net result of it is that the big tobacco companies are using this device to run out the little fellows who have to pay a tax on the little books of cigarette papers they sell.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not so certain that the big cigarette manufacturers are not using this tax to try to put out of business those who are making the tobacco that is used by men who are not able to buy expensive cigarettes, in order that they may enjoy the cigarettes they roll themselves.

Mr. REED. The Senator knows that the most expensive types of pipe tobacco are made by the big companies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 286, line 20, insert:

PART VI—TAX ON CIGARETTE PAPERS

SECTION 751. TAX ON CIGARETTE PAPERS

Section 402 of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by inserting after "importer" a comma and the following: "or removed for consumption or sale," and by striking out "more than 25 but."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the meaning of the amendment involved in that language is that, regardless of the number of sheets in a package—2, 5, 10, 15, or anything below 25—this tax applies. I certainly hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have received some protests from manufacturers of these papers in my State. They inform me that until recently this kind of paper was manufactured abroad, but that it is now possible to manufacture it in this country. It has become rather a profitable and successful business.

They inform me that if the limitation which is in the present law is removed it would be ruinous to them, and they are in accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Kentucky in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. I have received some information which seemed to indicate that the principal supporters of this tax are those large manufacturers of cigarettes who want to discourage people who can not buy cigarettes but who roll their own cigarettes from doing so. To what extent is that information correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator's information is correct. Of course, we know that in this country there are millions of men who are out of employment at this time who have been in the habit of smoking. It is rather harsh to ask them to give up that pleasure altogether, and many of them are now resorting to the purchase of tobacco in sacks, and with that tobacco, usually an ounce, costing a nickel, they get a small package of cigarette papers free. The proposal is to tax those people, who are not able to buy the expensive cigarettes, for the privilege of smoking, and tax them for the right even to make their own cigarettes, in their own homes, with their own hands.

It seems to me it is an injustice, and, in addition to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, I will say that while it is true that the cigarette paper used by the large manufacturers in manufacturing cigarettes is imported, the particular type of paper used by those who roll their own cigarettes is made in the United States, and certainly this burden should not be placed upon a home industry, in addition to placing an unnecessary burden upon those who use this type of tobacco.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the other day I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] providing for the exception of the tax on bank checks of less than $5, was rejected. I am informed that if that vote should be reconsidered, and the amendment should be agreed to, it would mean a loss of $40,000,000 of income. I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the matter to which I am about to advert is a trifling one, but I believe it is a just suggestion I have to make.

I understand that down in South Carolina, I think at Charleston, there is a factory which makes briquettes out of what is known as duff, which in this country is called "culm," which is brought from England or Wales. There is only one such factory in the country, brought to my attention by some Pennsylvanians who are interested in this South Carolina establishment.

I am told that there is no possibility of using any competitive American material for the manufacture of these briquettes; that it is utterly impossible, because of freight rates, to use coal from Pennsylvania or Virginia or West Virginia for that purpose; and that the only source of supply available to these people is this very cheap trash which we call "culm" and which they get from Wales.

It seems to me that it would not at all interfere with the adopted policy with regard to coal importations if we should insert an exception to take care of that culm and duff. Therefore I send an amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 243, line 20, after the word "classification," the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to insert in parentheses the words "except culm and duff."

Mr. REED. It would take unanimous consent, of course, to insert this amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, is the Senator proposing to broaden the tariff with reference to this coal item?

Mr. REED. To narrow it, to remove the tariff from these products.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, the Senator now wants to take the tariff off something?

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the unanimous consent will be granted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if we are going to get the sales-tax proposal before the Senate, I hope it will soon be brought up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to recognize anyone who rises.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am ready.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say that I have held back from offering the amendment so as to give Senators who had amendments to offer an opportunity to do so, it being the impression that after the sales-tax amendment was disposed of there would be a mad rush from the Chamber and Senators would not have a chance to get a hearing. I have been trying to accommodate Senators.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator has been very courteous, and that has been his policy, but I had hoped we might get the amendment up.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator presents the amendment, I find one more thing which seems to call for correction.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. REED. It will take only a second to explain it. The committee, like the House of Representatives, backed and filled and reversed itself half a dozen times in regard to the domestic tax on lubricating oil. Finally, quite without intending to do so, it landed a 4-cent domestic tax on lubricating oil, just exactly the same as the import tax, and we now have the paradox that crude petroleum coming into the country is taxed, whereas the highest-priced product made from it remains untaxed.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] I understood was to offer some corrective amendment, but I am advised that he has not done so. This, again, would require unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I shall object to unanimous consent to take up the lubricating-oil matter.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. It will be in conference.

Mr. REED. If I can not get unanimous consent, of course I will not make a motion.

Mr. HARRISON. As I said, it will be in conference.

Mr. REED. I see the Senator from Texas now in the Chamber. I will say to him that I was bringing up the question of the differential between the domestic and the imported lubricant. A motion to reconsider has been filed, but I am quite aware of the fact that in the present temper of the Senate it would be impossible to secure the adoption of the motion, so I think we had better let the matter go to conference.

Mr. CONNALLY. On what page is that?

Mr. REED. Page 241, lines 6 to 11. I entered a motion to reconsider in due time.

Mr. CONNALLY. On the imported or the domestic?

Mr. REED. The domestic. A motion to reconsider the vote as to the imported has been voted down, and that is a closed issue, but I refer to the domestic tax. The committee amendment in lines 6 to 11 will be in conference. It may be that some action may be taken there.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that the spread between the Senate committee bill and the House provision is such that the matter can be adjusted in conference.

Mr. REED. I think so, and that is the best way of treating it. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, allow me to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the differential of 2 cents on imported was all that was asked. The Senate has made a differential of 4 cents, and we do not want that much. We can work it out in conference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. KING. I submitted a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 269, dealing with admission taxes, was agreed to. I made a motion to reconsider the items on page 269, line 1 and line 13, and on page 270, line 25, by which "11" was stricken out and "41" was inserted. I ask permission to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask to have it reported.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, since the amendment which is about to be offered by the Senator from Massachusetts seems to be the last one, I ask unanimous consent that all motions to reconsider which have not been called up may be withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the amendment is a long one, covering 38 printed pages. Most Senators have had it upon their desks several days. I shall be glad to explain it, but unless some Senator desires to have it read, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I now ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment proposed by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts is as follows:

On page 241, strike out lines 6 to 11, both inclusive.

On page 245, strike out all after line 4 down to and including line 17 on page 264, except the committee amendment relating to tax on gasoline and the amendment relating to tax on electricity, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 602. GENERAL MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAX—IMPOSITION

"(e) Exemption under this section of sales or importations shall be allowed or granted only upon compliance with the regulations.

"SEC. 603. TAX ON SALES BY REGISTERED DEALERS

"(a) There is hereby imposed on the sale or other disposition by a registered dealer of any article sold to or imported by him free of tax by virtue of his registration, if not sold as an article for further manufacture to a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, a tax of 1¾ per cent of the price (subject to the provisions of section 604 (a)) at which such article was sold to such registered dealer, plus, in the case of an imported article, the amount of duties imposed thereon under any provision of the customs laws, if not included in such price. If the commissioner determines that the records with respect to any article are inadequate, such article shall be held to be sold otherwise than as an article for further manufacture to a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer.

"(b) If the commissioner determines that it is not necessary in the interests of the revenue to trace the identity of articles of any class in the hands of registered dealers, the regulations may provide a method of determining the proper tax liability of registered dealers with respect to articles of that class without regard to the identity of the individual articles.

"(c) Articles of such classes as the commissioner may prescribe may (in accordance with the regulations) be sold to or imported by registered dealers free of tax when it is impracticable to determine whether or not they will be resold as articles for further manufacture to licensed manufacturers or registered dealers, and the tax provided for in subsection (a) shall be imposed with respect to such articles if not so resold.

"SEC. 604. SALE PRICE

"(a) Generally: In determining the sale price of an article there shall be included any charge for coverings and containers of whatever nature, and any charge incident to placing the article in condition packed ready for shipment, but there shall be excluded the amount of tax imposed by this title, whether or not stated as a separate charge. A transportation, delivery, insurance, installation, or other charge (not required by the foregoing sentence to be included) shall be excluded from the sale price only if the amount thereof is established to the satisfaction of the commissioner, in accordance with the regulations.

"(b) Sales on consignment: In the case of an article sold on consignment, the sale price shall be the fair manufacturer's price for the article.

"(c) Retail sales by licensed manufacturer: In the case of an article sold by the manufacturer or producer thereof at retail (or directly to the consumer or user), the tax shall (if based on the sale price) be imposed upon the price at which so sold, except that in the case of any such article ordinarily sold at wholesale (or directly to the consumer or user at prices varying with the quantity or character of use) by manufacturers or producers, the tax shall (if based on the sale price) be imposed upon the fair manufacturer's price for the article.

"(d) Installment sales: In the case of a contract for the sale by a licensed manufacturer of an article, wherein it is provided that the sale price shall be paid to the manufacturer by installments, and the title to the article sold does not pass to the purchaser thereof until a future date notwithstanding partial payment by installments, or in the case of a conditional sale, each partial payment shall be regarded as a sale and there shall be imposed upon each payment that part of the tax which is proportionate to the part of the sale price represented by such payment.

"(e) Leases and royalties: If a licensed manufacturer leases an article or transfers the right of using the article but not the title thereto, or imposes a royalty on the use of an article, each payment with respect to the article shall be treated as a sale and the tax shall (if based on the sale price) be imposed upon the amount of such payment. Any such lease, transfer, or imposition of royalty on the use of any article by a registered dealer shall be treated as a sale.

"(f) Manufacture under contract: For the purposes of this title a person who manufactures or produces an article for another person who furnishes materials and retains title thereto, shall be regarded as the manufacturer or producer of the article, and the tax shall be imposed upon the first payment, or, if the tax is based on the sale price and there is more than one payment, the tax shall be imposed pro rata upon each payment; except that the person so furnishing materials shall be regarded as the manufacturer or producer of the article (1) if the article is to be resold by him and the effect of the application of this provision is to require him to be licensed under this title, or (2) if he is a licensed manufacturer.

"(g) Use or transfer of article in special cases: If a manufacturer or producer—

"(1) Uses (including use as material in repair work), otherwise than as an article for further manufacture, an article manufactured or produced by him, or sold to or imported by him free of tax by virtue of his license;

"(2) Transfers the title to an article by gift;

"(3) Transfers the title to, or the right to use, an article to any person (otherwise than through an arm's-length transaction) at less than the fair market price;

"Such use or transfer shall be considered a sale for the purposes of this title, and the sale price shall be the fair manufacturer's price for such article, with allowance for any tax previously paid with respect to any materials used in manufacturing or producing the article.

"(h) For the purposes of this section the fair manufacturer's price for an article shall be a fair manufacturers' or producers' sale price for the article at the place of manufacture or production, as determined by the commissioner, by reference to actual sales or to costs of manufacture or production, or otherwise.

"SEC. 605. OVERPAYMENTS, CREDITS, AND REFUNDS

"(a) A credit against tax under this title, or a refund, may be allowed or made—

"(1) To a licensed manufacturer, in the amount of any tax under this title (except section 601 (c) (4) to (7), inclusive, relating to tax on imported petroleum, coal, lumber, copper, and so forth) which has been paid with respect to an article for further manufacture purchased by him.

"(2) To a manufacturer or producer when he becomes licensed, in the amount of any tax paid under this title (except section 601 (c) (4) to (7), inclusive) with respect to articles for further manufacture on hand when the license is granted.

"(3) To the exporter, in the case of an article sold for exportation or exported for sale, in the amount of any tax paid under this title (except section 601 (c) (4) to (7), inclusive) with respect to the article.

"(4) To a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer who has paid tax under this title with respect to an article, when the sale price on which the tax was based is readjusted by reason of return or repossession of the article or a covering or container, or by a bona fide discount, rebate, or allowance, in the amount of that part of the tax proportionate to the part of the sale price which is refunded or credited.

"(b) Credit or refund under subsection (a) shall be allowed or made only upon compliance with the regulations.

"(c) In no case shall interest be allowed with respect to any amount of tax under this title credited or refunded.

"(d) In no case shall both credit or refund under subsection (a) and remission or drawback under the customs laws of the tax imposed by this title be allowed on account of the exportation of an article.

"(e) No overpayment of tax under this title (except sec. 601 (c) (4) to (7), inclusive, relating to tax on imported petroleum, coal, lumber, copper, etc.) shall be credited or refunded (otherwise than under subsection (a)), in pursuance of a court decision or otherwise, unless the person who paid the tax establishes, in accordance with regulations, (1) that he has not included the tax in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed, or collected the amount of tax from the vendee or (2) that he has repaid the amount of the tax to the ultimate purchaser of the article, or unless he files with the commissioner written consent of such ultimate purchaser to the allowance of the credit or refund.

"SEC. 606. LICENSED MANUFACTURERS AND REGISTERED DEALERS

"(a) Manufacturers and producers: Every manufacturer or producer (except as hereinafter provided) is hereby required to take out an annual license, in accordance with regulations, and shall pay a fee of $2 therefor. Licenses under this section shall expire upon June 30 of each year.

"(b) Exemptions: No license shall be required (but a license may be granted upon application) in the case of a manufacturer or producer (other than a manufacturer or producer of articles taxable under section 601 (c) (2) or (3), relating to tax on brewer's wort, malt sirup, grape concentrate, etc.)—

"(1) If a farmer, with respect to his agricultural products; or

"(2) if for the preceding year the total sale price of all articles (other than exempt articles) manufactured or produced by him was less than $20,000; or

"(3) if, in the case of a manufacturer or producer not engaged in manufacture or production of articles (other than exempt articles) during the whole of the preceding year, such manufacturer or producer files with the commissioner a statement under oath that to the best of his belief the probable total sale price of all articles (other than exempt articles) to be manufactured or produced by him during the year for which the exemption is claimed will be less than $20,000;

but in the case of any manufacturer or producer exempted under clause (2) or (3) of this subsection, if the commissioner determines, on the basis of sales for any period during the year for which the exemption was granted, that the probable total sale price of all articles (other than exempt articles) manufactured or produced by such manufacturer or producer during such year will not be less than $20,000, or if the total sale price of all articles (other than exempt articles) manufactured or produced and sold by such manufacturer or producer during such year reaches $20,000, such manufacturer or producer shall thereupon be required to be licensed.

"(c) Dealers and importers: A dealer in or importer of articles for further manufacture to be sold to licensed manufacturers or registered dealers may be granted an annual registration by the commissioner, upon application in accordance with regulations and payment of a fee of $100. Registrations under this subsection shall expire upon June 30 of each year.

"(d) Revocation or cancellation of dealer's registration: If the commissioner finds that a registered dealer has violated any provision of law applicable to the tax imposed by this title, he may revoke his registration. If the registration of any registered dealer is revoked, he shall not be entitled to registration within a period of one year after such revocation. The registration of any registered dealer may be canceled upon application by him.

"(e) Tax on revocation, cancellation, or expiration of registration: If a registered dealer's registration is revoked or canceled under subsection (d), or if a registered dealer's registration expires and is not renewed, he shall pay the tax imposed by this title (as if on a taxable sale at the time of revocation, cancellation, or expiration) on all articles purchased or imported by him free of tax by virtue of his registration and not resold by him prior to such revocation, cancellation, or expiration.

"(f) Tax on registered dealer on date title ceases to be in effect: Every dealer or importer registered on the day on which the tax imposed by this title ceases to be in effect shall pay the tax imposed by this title (as if on a taxable sale on such date) on all articles purchased or imported by him free of tax by virtue of his registration and not resold by him on or before such date.

"(g) Tax on expiration of manufacturer's or producer's license: If a manufacturer or producer ceases to be licensed before the date on which the tax imposed by this title ceases to be in effect, he shall pay the tax which would be imposed on a sale to him, as of the date on which he ceases to be licensed, of all articles purchased or imported by him free of tax by virtue of such license and not used as articles for further manufacture in the manufacture or production of articles on the sale of which tax has been imposed under this title prior to such date.

"SEC. 607. RETURNS, RECORDS, AND PAYMENT AND COLLECTION OF TAX

"(a) Every licensed manufacturer or registered dealer and every person liable for any tax under this title (other than tax levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the tariff act of 1930) shall make monthly returns under oath and pay the tax to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business, or if he has no principal place of business in the United States, to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall be made on or before the last day of each month for the preceding month, and shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the regulations prescribe.

"(b) The tax shall, without assessment by the commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time for filing the return. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 per cent a month from the time when the tax became due until paid.

"(c) Every licensed manufacturer and registered dealer, and every person liable for any tax imposed by this title (except tax levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the tariff act of 1930) shall keep such records, render under oath such statements, and comply with such regulations, as the commissioner with the approval of the secretary may from time to time prescribe. Whenever in the judgment of the commissioner necessary, he may require any person, by notice served upon him, to make a return, render under oath such statements, or keep such records as the commissioner deems sufficient to show whether or not such person is liable for tax under this title (except tax levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the tariff act of 1930), and the amount of any such liability. All records required under authority of this section with respect to any sale shall be kept in such manner as to be readily accessible to the commissioner or his agents for a period of four years from the last day of the month after the month in which such sale was made, unless the commissioner authorizes the destruction of such records at an earlier date, or unless an agreement under section 611 determining the amount of liability under this title with respect to such sale is approved by the Secretary or Under Secretary.

"(d) In case any other person acquires from or against a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, by operation of law or as a result of any transaction not taxable under this title, the right to sell any article, the sale of such article by such person shall be taxable as if made by such licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, and such person shall be liable for the tax.

"SEC. 608. EVASION OF TAX

"(a) Diversion of articles sold for exportation: No article the sale of which has been exempted from tax under section 602 (a) (4) (relating to sales for exportation) shall thereafter be sold for use, or used, in the United States, unless the person so selling or using it pays the tax which would have been imposed on such sale if it had not been so exempted.

"(b) Tax on sales to or importations by licensed manufacturers or registered dealers: If the commissioner finds that payment of tax under this title is being evaded or is likely to be evaded by a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, or a class of licensed manufacturers or registered dealers, he may require that the tax shall be imposed on the sale to, or the importation by, such licensed manufacturer or registered dealer, or class of licensed manufacturers or registered dealers, of any class of articles (even though articles for further manufacture or for resale to licensed manufacturers or registered dealers as articles for further manufacture). Credit or refund of tax so imposed may be allowed on proof by a licensed manufacturer that such articles have been used as articles for further manufacture in the manufacture or production of articles on the sale of which tax has been paid, or by a registered dealer that such articles have been resold to licensed manufacturers or registered dealers as articles for further manufacture.

"(c) Sale of article purchased as article for further manufacture: If a licensed manufacturer sells an article purchased or imported free of tax by virtue of his license, he shall be liable for tax under this title in the same manner as if such article were an article manufactured or produced by him.

"SEC. 609. TAX ON MANUFACTURER OR PRODUCER NOT LICENSED

"Any manufacturer or producer not licensed or required to be licensed under this title who sells an article and adds to the price any amount as tax under this title on such sale shall be liable for tax under this title equal to such amount; and any such person who sells an article at a price represented to include tax under this title on such sale shall be liable for tax under this title on such sale.

"SEC. 610. CONTRACTS FOR SALE ENTERED INTO BEFORE MARCH 1, 1932—REGULATED RATES

"If any person (1) is subject to governmental regulation with respect to the sale price of an article with respect to which a tax is imposed under this title, or (2) has prior to March 1, 1932, made a contract for the sale on or after the effective date of this title of an article, with respect to the sale of which a tax is imposed by this title, or with respect to which a tax is imposed by this section, and such contract does not permit the adding to the amount to be paid thereunder of the whole of such tax, and does not provide that the vendor shall pay such tax, then the vendee shall, in lieu of the vendor, pay so much of the tax as is not so permitted to be added to the contract price, or the price subject to regulation, as the case may be. If such a contract was made with the United States, no tax shall be imposed under this title.

"(b) The taxes payable by the vendee shall be paid to the vendor at the time the sale is consummated, and shall be collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor in the same manner as provided in section 702. In case of failure or refusal by the vendee to pay such taxes to the vendor, the vendor shall report the facts to the commissioner, who shall cause collection of such taxes to be made from the vendee.

"SEC. 611. FINAL AGREEMENTS

"The commissioner (or any officer or employee of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, including the field service, authorized in writing by the commissioner) is authorized to enter into an agreement in writing with any person relating to the liability of such person (or of the person for whom he acts) in respect of the tax imposed by this title (including the basis or method upon which such liability shall be determined or computed) for any period (past or future) specified in such agreement. If such agreement is approved by the Secretary or the Under Secretary, within such time as may be stated in such agreement, or later agreed to, such agreement shall be final and conclusive, and, except upon a showing of fraud or malfeasance, or misrepresentation of a material fact, (1) the case shall not be reopened as to the matter agreed upon, or the agreement modified, by any officer, employee, or agent of the United States, and (2) in any suit, action, or proceeding, such agreement or any determination, assessment, collection, payment, abatement, refund, or credit made in accordance therewith, shall not be annulled, modified, set aside, or disregarded; except that in its application to sales made after the date on which it is approved or agreed to, such agreement shall be held to be modified to the extent necessary to conform to any change in the law after such date.

"SEC. 612. EFFECT OF CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATIVE DECISIONS

"No amendment or revocation of any regulation, ruling, or decision of the commissioner or Secretary (or any official authorized in writing by either of them to make rulings or decisions which shall be subject to this section), in force at the time of the sale of an article, shall have the effect of increasing the liability under this title of any person with respect to such sale beyond his liability determined in accordance with such regulation, ruling, or decision in force at the time of such sale.

"SEC. 613. APPLICABILITY OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

"All provisions of law (except criminal penalties) applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 600 of the revenue act of 1926, shall, in so far as applicable and not inconsistent with this act, be applicable in respect of the tax imposed by this title.

"SEC. 614. PENALTIES

"Any person willfully violating any provision of this title or any provision of law, in respect of the tax imposed by this title, shall (in lieu of any other criminal penalty provided for therein) be fined an amount equal to one-half the amount of tax evaded or not paid or collected and accounted for (or if such amount can not be determined to the satisfaction of the court, or if no tax was evaded or not paid or collected and accounted for, then not more than $1,000), or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, together with the costs of prosecution.

"SEC. 615. EXCLUSION OF TAX FROM GROSS INCOME

"If a licensed manufacturer or registered dealer includes in his gross income for income-tax purposes, any portion of his gross receipts paid to the United States as tax under this title, he shall be allowed such amount as a deduction from gross income for income-tax purposes; but no deduction in respect of such tax shall be otherwise allowed under section 23 (c) or (d) of Title I (income tax).

"SEC. 616. REGULATIONS

"The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe and publish such regulations as he may deem necessary for the enforcement of this title in so far as it relates to taxes on sales. The Secretary shall prescribe and publish such regulations as he may deem necessary for the enforcement of this title in so far as it relates to taxes which are to be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as duties imposed by the tariff act of 1930.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the tax bill now before us seeks to raise $1,250,000,000 of additional revenues for the Federal Government. Congress is in substantial agreement that this amount represents the absolute minimum of our requirements if we are to approximately balance the Federal Budget. Even with a billion dollars of additional revenue we shall still, for the time being, have to leave out of our calculations the sinking-fund requirements of our present bonded debt. We shall have to leave out of the calculation additional expenditures which in the present emergency probably can not be avoided; and we are proceeding also with a pledge to put into effect all possible economies in the operation of the Government.

Our problem, therefore—and, indeed, under the circumstances, our duty—is to levy additional taxes of sufficient amount to yield the additional billion dollars.

We have turned first to the question of what increases may properly be made in the rates of tax on individual income and on corporate profits. The House made substantial increases in these rates all along the line, and the Senate has still further increased the rates.

We have refused a proposal to still further increase the rates on individual incomes and to impose the war-time income taxes. We are being asked to reconsider that rejection, and those who favor the war-time income taxes contend that the additional revenues which we require should be obtained in that manner rather than in the form of excise taxes—either special excise taxes or a general excise tax.

They stress the argument that when our citizens pay income taxes they have a full realization of the tax burden, whereas the tax which is collected in the form of an excise tax is concealed; that the former is a direct tax and the latter an indirect tax, and that the direct method is to be preferred.

They contend also that excise taxes will in reality be paid by the same class of our citizens as now pay income taxes, and so, in effect, we are taking the money out of the same pockets, whether we take it in excise taxes or in still higher income taxes. In my judgment, this is a superficial and inaccurate appraisal of the situation. In the first place there are now outstanding in the country twenty billion of tax-exempt securities, and the income from this gigantic aggregation of capital is beyond the reach of any income tax we may impose and contributes nothing to the support of the Government. But we do reach the income from tax-exempt securities through excise taxes. Whatever part of this vast increment of wealth is expended for the purchase of goods, wares, and merchandise—and it may be safely assumed a large part of it is so expended—will be taxed under a general manufacturers' excise tax.

In the second place income received from dividends is not subject to normal income tax. An individual may have an income of as much as five or six thousand dollars annually in the form of dividends and pay no income tax whatever.

In the third place, under present conditions there are great numbers of persons who are living wholly or in part on their capital rather than their income, and their expenditures, which may run into very large amounts, are not reached by any income tax.

In the fourth place hundreds of millions of dollars are tied up in annuities and escape income taxes.

But, in my judgment, the most important reason for choosing a general manufacturers' excise-tax levy in the present emergency instead of looking to still higher income-tax rates as a source of revenue is the fact that it is preferable to elect a certainty rather than an uncertainty in the matter of our revenues. The manufacturers' excise tax is a certainty. It will take effect immediately. Within 60 days from the enactment of the law the proceeds from this tax will begin to flow into the Treasury.

We have accurate figures as to the consumption of goods, but we have no accurate figures as to future individual incomes. No matter how high we make the income tax we obtain no money from this source until March 15 next year, and what we will obtain then on the basis of any given rate is fraught with a higher degree of uncertainty than ever before. In times like the present, when business has halted, when profits have vanished, when salaries have been cut or stopped altogether, and when large losses have been incurred on every hand, how can we determine what we can obtain in the form of a tax which is levied on net income or on profits?

We have spent much time in debating the question of tariffs, the levying of taxes upon imports. Many of us have strongly opposed the writing of any such tariff items into this revenue bill. But whether for better or for worse, that question, so far as action has yet been taken, has been settled; whatever may be said, it is perfectly apparent that little, if any, revenue from these tariff taxes will accrue to the Government, and it is with the question of raising revenue that we are principally concerned.

We have rejected the proposal to legalize 2.75 per cent beer and to tax it, and thereby obtain very large revenues. Instead we are surreptitiously taxing beer by levying an excise tax at a high rate on wort, an ingredient of home-brew, and upon grape concentrate, which is used in the making of wine. And when we reach this point of the bill, we are still several hundred million dollars short of our goal.

How are we to raise this money? What taxes are we to impose? That is the question, and the only question, which confronts us. With the exception of the proposal to increase the postal rates, which I shall discuss in detail later, we are proposing to levy at a high rate a limited number of excise taxes. Such excise taxes are the only source of revenue open to us. On the one hand, we tax income and profits, and when we go as far in that direction as we can safely go and obtain as much revenue from that source as we may safely obtain, and then find that we must still have additional revenues, we can only turn to excise taxes.

When we come to the question of excise taxes, we have a choice between selecting a few industries and a few products and imposing upon them a tax at a high rate, or taking all industries and all products and imposing on them a tax at a very low rate. The Ways and Means Committee of the House, faced with the necessity of making a choice between special excise taxes at a high rate and a general manufacturers' excise tax at a low rate, chose, without party or partisan considerations, the latter; and the bill as reported to the House, as we all know, carried a general manufacturers' excise tax. When the House itself rejected that tax it had no alternative but to impose high excise taxes on a very considerable number of articles. We have the same decision to make here, and if we are not willing to accept as an emergency measure a general manufacturers' excise tax we, too, must vote for a long series of special manufacturers' excise taxes.

There has been a vast deal of talk about a "sales tax," and the proposal recommended by the House Ways and Means Committee was popularly referred to as the sales tax instead of a manufacturers' excise tax. The amendment providing for a manufacturers' excise tax which I have offered is closely patterned after the manufacturers' excise tax originally in the House bill.

In fairness, it should be said that a general sales tax is an entirely different proposal from the manufacturers' excise tax. A general sales tax, as its very name implies, is a tax imposed every time an article is sold, and many articles are sold over and over again before finally reaching the consumer, with the result that under a general sales tax the consumer pays not one, but three or five or a dozen taxes. The tax is pyramided. No one, so far as I know, has proposed to this Congress a general sales tax. I oppose such a tax.

The manufacturers' excise tax proposal is to lev the tax once, upon the article in its finished state, but at its wholesale selling price, not at the retail price. It is quite true that this tax falls upon the consumer to pa and is therefore a tax upon consumption. But that is true of many of the special excise taxes which have been adopted. The principle is the same. In the final analysis it is a question of whether the consumer shall pay a high tax upon certain articles which he purchases, or a very low tax on a large percentage of his purchases. I say a large percentage of his purchases rather than on all his purchases, because we are proposing to exempt from any tax all food and all clothing, save high-priced shoes, suits, overcoats, and dresses, which are not to be exempted and which are to bear their share of the tax, as they should do, because they are purchased only by the well-to-do.

Before I discuss the present amendment for a general manufacturers' excise tax in detail, I want to direct the attention of the Senate and the country to the nature and effect of the special excise taxes which we have already voted and must impose if we do not accept the general excise tax. The Senate bill proposes taxes on automobiles, on trucks, on automobile tires, tubes, and accessories, at various rates but in substantial amount. The automobile industry insists that automobiles no longer may be classified as a luxury, but that they are in fact an everyday necessity and a vital transportation agency and an essential element in industry. I think we will all agree to that. And so there is no real justification for singling out automobiles, trucks, and tires to bear a special tax burden. We have as an excuse simply that it is a large industry and an easy target for taxation, and that positively it will yield large revenue.

We have now voted to put back into the bill almost all the other special excise taxes which the House was obliged to turn to when the general manufacturers' excise-tax plan was discarded.

We have put back into the bill an excise tax on certain toilet preparations at the rate of 10 per cent, and on furs, and on jewelry, and on radios, and chewing gum, and candies, and soft drinks, and matches, and firearms, and shells, and sporting goods, and cameras. Such special excise taxes are utterly indefensible, except upon the theory that we must have the revenue at any cost. They work the most manifest discriminations. Some of their proponents contend that these are luxury taxes and that, hence, only the rich will pay a tax. We have only to name a list of articles which we have singled out for these special taxes to show the utter absurdity of this contention that these are luxury taxes. If chewing gum, candy, and soft drinks are luxuries, they are the luxuries of the poor. What can we name that is more obviously a necessity than matches?

It seems to me, therefore, that there is little force in the objection raised against the general manufacturers' excise tax; that it is bad because it is a tax upon consumption, when, in fact, we are going to levying many taxes on consumption anyway. The only issue is how and where we shall levy it.

EXEMPTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Let me turn now to the question of what exemptions are to be made if we impose a general manufacturers' excise tax. Obviously, the further we go with exemptions the more we destroy the principle of a general tax and the more it becomes a special tax. And so, if the theory of a general tax at a low rate spread over all industry and all consumption very thinly is sound, we must proceed slowly and guardedly in the matter of exemptions.

The general principle has to give way to what we may regard as the necessities of the situation or to what may be termed "expediency." Under existing conditions in the country, most of us agree that, no matter how heavy taxes we are obliged to levy, no matter how great the necessities of the Government for revenue, it is unconscionable to tax the food and clothing of the poor. And thus, because we can not draw the line between food purchased by the poor and that purchased by the rich, it is proposed to exempt from tax all food. That is the first exemption in the present amendment, and it is stated in just as broad language as it is possible to devise.

Second. We exempt all clothing, with the single limitation that shoes costing more than $5 a pair and articles of clothing costing more than $35 each are not to be exempt from tax. It is expressly stated that a suit of clothes or a dress, regardless of how many pieces it may consist, shall be regarded as a single article. In fact, therefore, all wearing apparel is exempted from the proposed tax except high-priced shoes and high-priced suits, overcoats, and dresses. I say "high priced" because the $5 figure for shoes and the $35 figure for wearing apparel are not the retail price but the wholesale price, which means, of course, that the only shoes and suits upon which any tax will fall are the sort offered for sale to the consumer at prices very much higher than the $5 and $35 figure.

Third. We propose to exempt all medicines other than patent or proprietary medicines. It seems to me there can be no argument on that point.

Fourth. We propose to exempt all agricultural products, and it will be noted that in the amendment the definition of agricultural products is made in as broad language as possible. In addition to agricultural products we propose to exempt agricultural implements and machinery, and because gas and electricity are included in the range of this general excise tax we specifically exempt all gas and electricity for farm use or for irrigation or other agricultural purposes. Fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients are exempted.

In other words, in the imposition of this tax we are saying first that the food of all persons and the wearing apparel of all persons excepting the wearing apparel of the prosperous are to be exempted from tax and that all agricultural products and most things the farmer employs in the production of his products are to be exempted from tax.

Then we exempt the workman's hand tools in order that the mechanic and the artisan may not feel that we are laying any tax upon the articles which he requires in the earning of his livelihood.

We exempt from this tax any article upon which an internal-revenue tax is now imposed under existing law. The most conspicuous example of this is the present tax on tobacco and cigarettes. Having taxed them once at a high rate we do not propose to tax them a second time.

We exempt newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals. We exempt books and music which is in raised print used exclusively by the blind and textbooks for use in the schools, and Bibles and articles used for religious purposes.

I submit that we have gone as far as we ought to go—and, indeed, it seems to me, as far as we can go—in the range of these exemptions. We have sacrificed a considerable amount of revenue in thus excluding from the tax food and clothing.

It has been said, with some force, that we ought also to exempt household furniture, and the cry has been raised that we are to tax the poor man's bed. It seems to me that the daily necessities of life, the food which must be purchased from day to day in order to sustain life, and the clothing which must be purchased in order to cover the body, are in a class by themselves. If we are to go farther and undertake to exempt household furniture, we open up an almost endless field of exemptions, including the expensive and luxurious furniture of the wealthy. Furthermore, it is almost impossible to administer. To attempt to differentiate between these articles would be almost as difficult as to exempt the low-price food of the worker's family and the expensive food of the affluent.

When we have established the boundary lines of a general manufacturers' excise tax and have determined what articles of commerce are to be included and what are to be excluded from its application, we have next to determine the rate of the tax to be imposed. In the broad aspect of the matter, the question of rate is the question of how much revenue we propose to raise by this tax.

I have been informed by the Treasury Department that under the terms of my amendment a rate of 1 per cent is estimated to yield in revenue the sum of $190,000,000; a rate of 1½ per cent is estimated to yield $287,000,000; a rate of 1¾ per cent is estimated to raise $335,000,000; a rate of 2 per cent, $380,000,000; and so on up the scale. Later estimates have reduced these figures. We should fix the rate at the lowest point consistent with the minimum necessities of the case. That is too obvious to require argument.

The amendment which I have offered specifies a rate of 1¾ per cent, estimated to yield, as I said a moment ago, $335,000,000. That rate represents my own judgment after long and earnest consideration. If we make the rate lower, we are not able to go so far in eliminating other tax items from the bill. If we make the rate higher, we can go further in eliminating other tax items from the bill. There is much that may be said on both sides when it comes to any particular rate.

I believe a fair approach to the whole question is to determine first whether we shall have a general manufacturers' excise tax instead of many special excise taxes; and if we decide that question in the affirmative, then and not until then do we need to decide the question of the rate at which this tax shall be imposed.

On the basis of the rate of 1¾ per cent, estimated to yield $335,000,000, our next step is to determine how this sum shall be applied; that is to say, what taxes provided for in the bill as reported by the Senate committee we can afford to eliminate if we substitute the general manufacturers' excise tax.

First, we propose to eliminate the 3 per cent tax on passenger automobiles, estimated to yield $44,000,000, and the 2 per cent tax on auto trucks, estimated to raise $4,000,000, and the 1 per cent tax on parts and accessories, estimated to raise $7,000,000. These are the rates and amounts provided for in the House bill, and the rates to which the Senate has now tentatively assented.

We are proposing to eliminate the special excise tax on tires and tubes, as finally recommended by the Senate Finance Committee, estimated to yield $33,000,000.

We propose to eliminate other special excise taxes, including proposed taxes on cosmetics, jewelry, furs, sporting goods, cameras, and firearms at the rate of 10 per cent; on mechanical refrigerators at the rate of 5 per cent; on candy and chewing gum at the rate of 2 per cent; on soft drinks at graduated rates; and on matches.

We are proposing to reduce the 2-cent tax on bank checks, estimated to yield $95,000,000, to 1 cent, thereby reducing the yield by one-half, and to eliminate entirely the proposed tax on real-estate conveyances, estimated to yield $10,000,000.

We propose to eliminate entirely the 4-cent transfer tax upon bond transfers which is now contained in the bill. Transfers of shares of stock have long been subject to a Federal tax, but this is the first time it has been proposed to impose a tax on bond transfers. The two taxes do not stand upon the same footing, since all except registered bonds are transferable from hand to hand without the necessity of any record. For this reason a tax on bond transfers is a difficult one to collect, and as a matter of sound public policy it has seemed to me best to avoid a bond transfer tax if we can.

We have proposed to eliminate entirely the tax on lubricating oils, at the rate of 4 cents per gallon, estimated to yield $35,000,000. The levying of such tax should be left to the States as a source of revenue as in the case of gasoline.

I propose to eliminate the tax on oil transported by pipe line. On the basis of a 3 per cent rate as carried in the Senate bill this tax represented an estimated yield of $6,000,000.

The amendment which I have offered also provides for the elimination of the proposed increase in second-class postage rates, which increase was estimated to bring in an additional $5,000,000 in postal receipts, and to exempt from the proposed increase in the first-class letter postage all letters mailed and delivered in the same community. This exemption, with respect to letter mail, makes a difference of $26,000,000, according to Post Office Department estimates.

The total of the estimated revenues of the items in the Senate bill for which it is now proposed to substitute the general manufacturers' excise tax is $292,800,000. The recapitulation of these items is as follows:

Excise tax on—
Passenger automobiles, Trucks, Parts and accessories	$55,000,000
Tires and tubes	33,000,000
Chewing gum	1,000,000
Radios	11,000,000
Cosmetics and toilet preparations	12,000,000
Furs	8,000,000
Jewelry	5,000,000
Mechanical refrigerators	6,000,000
Sporting goods	5,000,000
Firearms	2,500,000
Cameras	1,000,000
Matches	5,000,000
Candy	5,000,000
Soft drinks	7,300,000
Bank checks, from 2 cents to 1 cent	47,500,000
Tax on bond transfers	5,000,000
Tax on real-estate conveyances	10,000,000
Tax on oil transported by pipe line	6,000,000
Tax on lubricating oil	35,000,000
Tax on cigarette papers	1,500,000
Elimination of increase in second-class postage rates	5,000,000
Exemption of drop letters in case of first-class postage increase	26,000,000
	292,800,000

The difference between this total of $292,800,000 and $335,000,000, the estimated yield of the general excise tax at the 1¾ per cent rate, will in part offset the revenue which we have sacrificed in raising the exemptions in the case of the admissions tax. With the admissions-tax exemption at 10 cents, as was originally recommended by the Senate Finance Committee, the estimated revenue yield was $110,000,000. With the exemption at 41 cents, which has now been agreed to, the revenue yield is approximately $45,000,000, so that we have a $65,000,000 item to be made up.

Since all these figures were prepared, later estimates have reduced them but have not materially changed the relative ratios. If we eliminate additional items from the bill, we must either increase the rate of the general manufacturers' excise tax or we must pass a bill which falls short of the $1,250,000,000 of additional revenue which is our goal.

The question of the proposed increase in first-class postage rates from 2 cents to 3 cents is one of great consequence. I wish we could avoid any increase in postage rates, and at the outset of our consideration of this bill I entertained the hope that at least we could hold the increase in first-class rates to 2½ cents rather than to 3 cents. But I have come to the conclusion that in view of the amount of additional revenue, which we are obliged to provide under any circumstances and because of the large operating deficit in the Post Office Department, the increase to 3 cents in the first-class postage rate can not very well be avoided. It is proposed to exempt from the increase all letters mailed and delivered within the same town or city. I recognize fully the force of the contention that the postal deficit does not arise from losses sustained in the handling of first-class letter mail, but rather arises from parcel-post matter, costly air mail contracts, and ocean mail contracts, which are in the nature of subsidies to commercial aviation and to the American merchant marine.

I agree that many phases of our Postal Service require reconsideration by Congress, as well as by the Post Office Department, and that our whole policy with respect to subsidies should be reexamined, that perhaps all postal rates ought to be revised. But we ought not delay the passage of the revenue bill on that account. As a practical matter, at the present moment we must either substantially increase postal revenues or we must impose additional taxes in some other direction to make up the deficit in present postal revenues, and it has seemed to me that under such circumstances certainly the most expedient course, and probably the fairest course, is to increase postal revenues, and to obtain this increase by raising the first-class postage rate.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST AMENDMENT

Let us now consider some of the objections most frequently raised to the amendment which I have offered.

One of the chief arguments is a mistaken one, in that it confuses a general sales tax with this proposal of a manufacturers' excise tax. Let us define these two forms of taxation.

A general sales tax, such as is in operation in many countries, particularly in France, is a tax levied on all sales, with the result that a given article, by the time it reaches the consumer, has borne several taxes at the various stages of transfer. For instance, where a general sales tax is levied, a small tax is levied on the producer when he transfers the article to the dealer in raw materials. Another tax is paid by the dealer in raw materials when he transfers or sells the product to the manufacturer; another tax when the manufacturer sells to the wholesaler; and another tax when the wholesaler sells to the retailer; and sometimes a tax when the retailer sells to the consumer.

The manufacturers' excise tax proposed in this amendment leaves one tax only on the finished manufactured article. There is no tax to be paid by the producer of the raw materials or in any of the intermediate stages of transfer or sale. This amendment provides for the issuing by the Federal Government of a license to all manufacturers and producers doing business in excess of $20,000 annually. The purpose of this license is to allow tax-free transfers from manufacturers and producers when the article is to enter into further manufacture or production, with the result that there is no tax until the last manufacturer sells the completed article.

For illustration: Let us take an iron producer. The company operating the mine, under the licensing system, would be able to sell tax free to, say, the smelter which converted the ore into pig iron; then the smelter would be able to sell tax free to a licensed rolling mill, which converted the pig iron into sheet steel. Then, under this system, that mill could sell tax free to, for instance, a manufacturer of automobile bodies, and that manufacturer could sell his bodies tax free to a manufacturer of automobiles. But, when that manufacturer sold the completed automobile to a wholesaler or dealer or user, the tax would then be imposed. That would be a tax on the value of the finished article.

If, along the line, one of these dealers or intermediate manufacturers sold the partly manufactured article to an unlicensed person, so that the tax was payable, and if that article was later purchased from the unlicensed person by a licensed manufacturer, and used in making a finished article on which the tax was imposed, there is provision for a credit of the tax paid on the prior sale, so that in no case is there duplication of the tax on any article.

The advantage of the license system is not only that of prevention of pyramiding the taxes but also it gives a convenient method of determining what sales are taxable and what sales are not taxable.

Take the case of a mill producing textile cloth: The goods which that mill would sell to a licensed manufacturer of automobiles would be exempt, but the finished yard goods that he would sell to a retail store, to be sold to consumers by the yard, would be taxed when sold by the producing mill.

Second. An objection often heard is that this is a tax on the poor man and bears more heavily upon him than upon the well-to-do. The answer to this objection is, first and foremost, that the principal purchases of the so-called poor man are exempt from taxation; namely, his food and clothing. Furthermore, there is no tax upon his rent, as this is a tax upon manufactured articles. This tax might apply to materials used in future buildings, but would not apply to any buildings already constructed. Furthermore, the tax is only temporary, for two years. It does not come with good grace from Senators to object to this tax of 1¾ per cent on lumber when they have already in this bill voted a sales tax of 33⅓ per cent on lumber used in the homes of the poorer classes, through the tariff item of $3 per 1,000 feet of lumber. The same is true of coal, with a tariff tax of about 45 per cent ($2 per ton) on a ton of coal.

Third. A third objection, which is a variation of the same argument, is that the tax is not based on ability to pay, as the income-tax rates are. The answer to this is that it is a tax on ability to pay. The man whose purchases are small and limited absorbs a very small proportion of this tax, assuming that it is transmitted to him when he buys. The wealthy class, outside of those who may be included in the miser category, spend in proportion to their incomes and therefore are taxed in proportion to their purchases. Furthermore, they pay more, in proportion to their purchases, than the so-called poorer classes, because they buy very much more of the finished articles that are not tax exempt. The poor man spends the great bulk of his money for food, clothing, and rent, while the rich man spends much more of his money for other things. For that reason, a tax is imposed here on clothing that the so-called prosperous class would purchase, while there is no tax on the clothing of the poorer classes.

So far as I am concerned, I would be glad to exempt only the cheaper-priced underwear, socks, ties, and so forth; but this can not be worked out administratively without including exemptions upon the expensive underwear, socks, and ties which the well-to-do purchase in large quantities. Thus it has been necessary, in order to exempt these articles used by the poorer classes, to even extend that exemption to the higher-priced underwear, hats, ties, and other clothing. The amendment permits shoes of less than $5 in wholesale value to be untaxed, and suits, coats, and dresses, and other articles of clothing of less than $35 to go untaxed. The figure 35 is thought to be sufficient to exclude all suits and overcoats retailing under $50. It is to be noted, for instance, that hats are exempt from taxation, but hats costing over $35 would be taxed. This would enable this tax to reach, in addition to the import tax, all expensive clothing imported from abroad or expensive domestic clothing.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics in 1930 conducted a survey of the budgets of 100 families, covering the full year of 1929, of employees of the Ford Motor Co. at Detroit. Each of these families included husband and wife, not less than two nor more than three children.

The average income of the family, based on earnings of $7 per day, in the Ford Motor Co. was $1,711.87. The average expenditures of the 100 families was $1,719.83, leaving an average deficit for all families of $7.96. These expenditures were divided as follows:

Study of 100 families

[Average size of family, 4.5. Average income per family, $1,711.87]

	Average yearly expense	Per cent of yearly expense
Clothing	$210.67	12.2
Food	556.12	32.3
Housing	388.81	22.6
Fuel and light	103.20	6.0
Total		73.1

So by the terms of the general manufacturers' excise tax amendment now before us a family whose income averages $1,711.87, as does that of the Ford worker's family would be exempt from any tax on 73.1 per cent of such income.

The remaining 26.9 per cent of the income of such family was distributed among furniture and house furnishings, life insurance, street-car and bus fares, expenses of sickness, school expenses, cleaning supplies, barber, and miscellaneous.

Fourth. Another objection heard is this: As a temporary measure and for the purpose of balancing the Budget it would be acceptable except that it is likely to become a permanent policy.

The answer to this is that this is limited to two years and will require an affirmative vote of Congress, after the tax has been thoroughly tried out, to have it renewed and established as a fixed principle.

Fifth. Another objection sometimes heard is that this tax, being such an easy revenue producer, is likely to encourage extravagance in governmental expenditures. The best answer to this is that without this tax the Government has reached the peak of extravagance in Government expenditures. Whatever validity this argument may have if the tax remained permanently in force, it can hardly be argued that the introduction of the tax as a temporary necessary measure to meet existing Budget requirements is likely to lead to additional appropriations by the Congress.

It does not seem to me that this argument is entitled to much weight under existing circumstances, in view of the temporary character of this tax and in view of the present drive to reduce Government expenditures.

Sixth. Another objection by people who urge higher income-tax rates is that this tax is unsound and a burden on productive industry; that it bears upon the industry which is struggling along or perhaps losing money, as well as on the prosperous industry.

The answer to this is that the Senate and House have refused to accept any higher income-tax rates than those in the bill on the theory that under existing conditions higher income-tax rates would be too burdensome and would tend to repress the movement to revive business. This means that we must go to some other source for revenue, and, broadly speaking, the only other source is some form of a tax on consumption, as distinguished from income, so that the choice now before us is between a broad general manufacturers' tax resting lightly on all industries and heavy taxes on selected industries, which, in order to raise the necessary revenue, must be imposed at high rates, with a very marked repressive effect upon those industries and, in some cases, a serious disturbance of competitive conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator ought to call attention to one other immense advantage in the tax he proposes, which is that by changing one figure, if it were adopted, we could either provide an increase or a decrease in revenue. It would be necessary merely to change one figure; that is all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Or one percentage.

Mr. SMOOT. Or one percentage. If the tax, for instance, were 1¾ cents, as provided in the pending amendment, and it were found necessary to secure slight additional revenue, that figure could be changed to 2 cents and we would immediately know just exactly what revenue would be derived from it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The statement of the Senator from Utah is entirely correct, and I am glad he has called attention to that additional advantage which would accrue from the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, will he permit a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Last night over a nation-wide broadcast the Senator from Massachusetts made a very remarkable speech on this subject. I wonder if he would permit me to ask that a copy of it be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of his remarks of to-night?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator thinks it is worthy of that, I shall be glad to have it done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The address is as follows:

"THE EMERGENCY MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAX," SPEECH OF HON. DAVID I. WALSH, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM MASSACHUSETTS, IN THE NATIONAL RADIO FORUM MAY 30, 1932

This day is consecrated to the memory of our dead, not only those who in life were near and dear to us personally but more particularly in a public way, to the departed heroes who valiantly served our country in her days of trial. To-day millions of us have visited their last resting places and have lovingly strewn upon their graves the fresh blooms with which nature during these spring days has adorned our hillsides and valleys.

Our thoughts have been solemn, serious, and tinged with sadness. Possibly some of us have had stirring in our breasts to-day a feeling of discouragement over the plight which is ours, a feeling which one of our poets expressed when he cried out—

"I am tired of planning and toiling
In the crowded hives of men;
Heart weary of building and spoiling,
And spoiling and building again."

I am sure, however, that the spirit which thrilled and inspired the devoted women who received the message of the angel at the tomb of the risen Christ on Easter morn, "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen," has entered our souls also.

We are not to linger in remorse and despondency at the tomb; our work is among the living, to bear our life burdens with resignation, to perform our daily tasks courageously, actuated by the high ideals that we love to associate with the memory of our dead, and which are, in the last analysis, the most cherished legacy they have bequeathed to us. Faithfulness to ideals, devotion to duty, sacrifice for exalted causes, love of neighbor and country, are the rays of light and hope that emerge from the clouds and mist which separate us from our departed ones.

This Memorial Day finds us greatly disturbed and frightened. Men and women who are willing to work are out of employment. Many business men are in bankruptcy. Many persons have seen their life's savings disappear almost over night in the great fall of quoted prices of goods and securities, and the failure of business organizations and banks. There is more poverty and poignant apprehension of poverty than we believed was ever possible in our hitherto bounteous land.

We grumble over what we regard as the heavy burden of taxation. We are worried and anxious over the ever-increasing expenses of government. We become excited over political differences. We have admittedly deep and grave social problems with which to deal. We must not, we can not minimize these matters, but we should compare them so far as possible with our blessings. If we turn back the pages of our history we will find our present hardships, unbearable as they may seem, not nearly as disastrous as those bravely endured by our forefathers who founded the Nation, or by those who served us on the battlefields. We must not lose the sustaining comfort that our departed possessed. It was their thought and belief, either on the battlefields or in the council halls of the Nation, in the wise guidance and the protecting power of omnipotent God which sustained them. We, too, will find comfort and strength from the same source. Our very troubles should make us realize and understand the futility of our efforts without steadfast reliance in the God of nations.

Let me turn now to the subject of my radio talk. The Congress of the United States is now engaged in grappling with a very grave problem, one fraught with serious consequences as to the immediate future of our country. It is the question of maintaining security and confidence in the credit of our Government. It is the basic undertaking necessary to prevent a further precipitation of the depression and to turn back the tidal wave of despair that surrounds us by establishing hope, confidence, and courage in the business life of the Nation.

That the tax bill now pending before the Congress will result in balancing the Budget, or at least in approaching that end, the public may well feel assured. There is one aspect of the bill now before the Senate on which I want particularly to speak, and I do so only because of my belief that the proposal which I favor would do more than any other which has been under consideration to assure a balanced Budget and a confidence that will assist tremendously in preparing the way for a business revival and for lessening unemployment, substituting hope for fear throughout the Nation.

The problem just now before the Congress is to obtain at least $1,000,000,000 of additional revenue for the Federal Treasury. We have suffered an extraordinary decline in the revenues derived from our existing taxes. The income of the Government has been cut in half, while our expenses have remained at a high level.

In the past taxes on individual incomes and on the profits of business and corporations have furnished the Government with the bulk of its income. We have, to be sure, derived large sums from taxes on imports and from our present taxes on tobacco. But with the decline in trade there has been a large falling off in our revenues from import taxes and at the same time our revenues from individual income and corporate taxes have undergone an extraordinary decline.

We are proposing large increases in income-tax rates and a substantial increase in the tax on the profits of corporations. But from the beginning of the consideration of the present bill it has been perfectly obvious that this source alone could not be relied upon to supply the full measure of our requirements.

It is apparent that under present conditions individual net incomes have undergone a tremendous shrinkage. It is immaterial how high the tax is on profits if there are no profits to tax. The extent to which profits have vanished is graphically revealed by recent figures covering the combined experience of 387 of the great corporations of this country during the first three months of the present year. Corporate profits in 1931 were none too good. We had a depression then, but for the first quarter of 1932 the net profits as shown by this cross-section of the business of the country were 73.8 per cent less than the 1931 record, and in the case of 59 railroads the combined deficit for the first quarter of this year was more than $47,000,000.

In the light of such figures the fallacy of contending that we can balance the Budget by increasing the taxes on incomes and gross profits is clearly exposed. Congress, not from choice but from necessity, has had to turn to new sources of taxation. We are turning to excise taxes to be imposed upon goods or upon services because it is the only remaining avenue of taxation open to the Federal Government. Here, again, as in the case with income taxes and with corporation taxes, our aim should be to impose excise taxes, often called sales taxes, in accordance with capacity to pay, and to distribute them as equitably as possible, with the least oppressive burden upon business or the individual.

The bill which passed the House and the bill in the form now before the Senate does not, in my judgment, accord with that principle. It includes a vast number of special excise taxes. It selects certain industries and certain products to bear this new tax burden. It imposes different rates on different articles and different industries, without consistency or any reasonable theory other than a guess at what the traffic will bear. It is proposed to tax automobiles at one rate, automobile tires at another rate. It is proposed to put a tax on candy and chewing gum and a variable tax on soft drinks. It is proposed to put one tax on furs, another on jewelry, on sporting goods, on toilet goods, and so on.

An illustration of the inequities and indeed the absurdities in which we find ourselves in the imposing of these special excise taxes is furnished by the proposed tax of 4 cents a gallon on lubricating oils. Lubricating oils are used extensively in industry and in motor vehicles. The price of the oils ranges from 8 cents a gallon to $1 a gallon, but the tax is to be 4 cents a gallon regardless of price, which means that we are proposing to put the equivalent of a 50 per cent tax on the oil in industry and a 4 per cent tax on oil used in motor vehicles. Such special excise taxes are utterly indefensible, except upon the theory that we must have the revenue at any cost. They work the most manifest discriminations. They disrupt business and industry and they raise unfair competitive barriers.

The alternative for these so-called selective excise taxes—selected, I may say, at random—is a general excise tax which shall be levied upon all industries alike at a low uniform rate. This, in brief, is my proposal, and it is referred to as the manufacturers' excise tax. It is indeed one kind of sales tax, and so indeed all of the excise taxes in the bill are sales taxes. Indeed all taxes are sales taxes. But in fairness it should be understood that a general turnover sales tax is an entirely different proposal from the emergency manufacturers' excise tax which is now before Congress, and which is embodied in the amendment which I have offered to the Senate bill.

A general turnover sales tax, as its very name implies, is a tax imposed every time an article is sold, and many articles are sold over and over again before finally reaching the consumer, with the result that under a general sales tax the consumer pays not one but three or five or a dozen taxes. The tax is pyramided. No one, so far as I know, has proposed to Congress a turnover sales tax of this character. Personally I am unalterably opposed to any such proposal. A manufacturers' excise tax, on the other hand, is to levy the tax once upon the article in its finished state, but on its wholesale selling price, not on the retail price.

The objection most often raised against a tax of this character is that it is a tax upon the consumer, and to the extent that the tax upon the manufacturer becomes one element, although a very small element, in the total cost of his product, it is true that in many cases this tax will fall upon the consumer, though in my own judgment a manufacturers' tax at as low a rate as we have proposed, namely 1¾ per cent, will be absorbed by the manufacturer in many more cases than the opponents of the tax are ready to admit.

But in order that there may be no departure from the principle of levying a tax on the basis of capacity to pay, and in order that it may not be said that we are levying a tax upon the necessities of life and laying new burdens on those least able to bear them and adding to the hardships of the victims of the depression, the general manufacturers' excise tax, if it be imposed, will exclude all food and articles of clothing except expensive wearing apparel of the rich. Medicines will be exempted; also workingmen's tools, newspapers, and periodicals, and articles for religious worship. In addition, I have proposed to exempt from the tax all products of the farm and all agricultural implements.

It has been repeatedly shown that in the families with incomes of $2,500 or less their food, clothing, and lodging account for more than 70 per cent of their total expenditures. Their other expenditures are for carfares and lunches, recreation, insurance, and savings, doctor bills, dentist bills, papers, magazines, and incidentals, laundry, church contributions—practically none of which are reached by this tax. This leaves one item which may be reached for taxation, namely, household-equipment upkeep, and this is estimated to constitute on the average between 4 and 5 per cent of the family's expense; and on this small item of the family's expenditures, hardly more than $100, we are proposing to levy a tax of 1¾ per cent, or $1.75, yearly on the wholesale value of their purchases. I submit, therefore, that so far as the citizen of limited means is concerned, the burden of the sales tax which we are proposing is infinitesimal.

In the case of the prosperous and the wealthy the contribution which they will make to the Federal Government through the medium of the manufacturers' excise tax will depend on the volume of their expenditures, and I submit that there is no fairer way of measuring their capacity to pay a tax than to measure it by the volume of their purchases, plus the graduated income tax already levied on them.

In a word, the manufacturers' excise tax, because of the exemptions which it carries, will not increase the cost of living to the masses, but it will tax the purchases of the well to do and the rich.

There is one other aspect of our tax problem of high importance which has figured but little in the current discussions of the subject. There are now outstanding $20,000,000,000 of Federal, State, and municipal bonds and notes which are tax exempt and which are beyond the reach of any income tax which Congress may lawfully impose. In addition to the twenty billions of wholly tax-exempt securities there are twelve billions of Government bonds partially exempt, in that the income therefrom is not subject to the normal tax. From these tax-exempt securities flows a vast annual volume of income which pays practically no tax, a large part of which is beyond the reach of the income tax, and can be reached, if at all, only through the medium of a tax upon expenditures, which is the principle of the manufacturers' excise tax.

In addition to this, the owners of stocks in domestic business corporations received in 1930, according to Treasury figures, over $4,000,000,000 in dividends. We do not levy the normal income tax on such dividends because of the fact that the corporation has already contributed a percentage of its profits out of which dividends are paid. Here is another vast sum of money in the possession of the so-called prosperous classes which we can reach with a consumption tax levied on the expenditure of this money in trade.

Nearly $2,000,000,000 is turned back annually from the treasuries of life-insurance companies to their policyholders in the form of annuities or death losses. This money is not taxable income, but if spent, will help bear the tax burden.

Time does not permit of further amplifying the advantages of a manufacturers' excise tax, but this ought to be said in conclusion, that in the present emergency it is preferable to elect a certainty rather than an uncertainty in the matter of revenues. The manufacturers' excise tax is a certainty. It will take effect immediately. Within 60 days of enactment of the law the proceeds will commence to flow into the Treasury. We have accurate figures as to consumption of goods, but we have no accurate figures as to future individual incomes or future business incomes. No matter how high we make the income tax, we obtain no money from this source until March 15 of next year, and what we will obtain then on a basis of any given rate is fraught with a higher degree of uncertainty than ever before.

The opponents in the Senate of the proposition I have just discussed, together with a few Senators who claim to favor the manufacturers' excise tax, all to the number of 55, signed and filed in the Senate to-day a round robin declaring their unwillingness to vote for any form of a general sales tax. Their explanation for this action is that they desired to prevent "unnecessary prolongation of debate."

This action, most unusual and unprecedented in the history of American legislation, will not forestall the presentation of the amendment providing for a general manufacturers' excise tax. Indeed, I believe when a full realization of the grave crisis in the country is manifest, we can confidently expect the patriotic spirit of Senators to assert itself and effect an abandonment of their pledge, especially when the importance of turning to the manufacturers' excise tax is found to be the surest and best method of balancing the Budget and the surest method of establishing unmistakable confidence in the credit of the United States Government.

The country now understands the issue—a low rate of tax widely distributed, or high taxes narrowly distributed. If we may judge from the avalanche of letters and telegrams and editorial expression on this question in recent weeks from all parts of the country representing all walks of life, wholly nonpartisan and patriotic, motivated only by a desire to assist the Government in this critical hour, we must conclude that the country is overwhelmingly in favor of the general manufacturers' excise tax as the lightest and the most equitable new tax to levy in this emergency.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I had expected to make some remarks on this subject, but nothing that I could say could add to the force of what has been so very ably said by the Senator from Massachusetts. I merely want to let the subject go with the statement that many of us agree with every word that he has so capably said.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, there was printed in the RECORD of yesterday a list of names of those Senators who thought it would be injudicious to press this proposed manufacturers' sales tax, and my name appeared in the list.

I signed the paper, and I have no regret or apology to make for having signed it, because it was represented that there was a group in the Senate determined upon a protracted discussion and a long delay of ultimate action on the tax bill, and I was not willing that the country should endure, in my view, the disastrous effect of a thing of that sort.

By a careful reading of the introductory lines of that list, it will be noted that no signer of it committed himself against the principle of a manufacturers' sales tax; and I, at least, want my own constituents not to misapprehend the vote that I shall be compelled to cast here because of my signature to that paper. In ordinary circumstances I should unhesitatingly vote for a manufacturers' sales tax.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not want to take the time of the Senate, but there appeared in yesterday's New York Times a dispatch from Paris regarding the French sales tax. This article reviewed the history of the tax, and its unpopularity there, and its workings there. I ask that it may be printed at this point in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Monday, May 30, 1932]

FRENCH SALES TAX IS MOST UNPOPULAR—MANUFACTURERS, WHOLESALERS, AND RETAILERS FIND THE MEASURE HURTS THEIR BUSINESS

PARIS, May 29.—There is no more unpopular tax in France than the turnover or sales tax which has been in operation for the past 10 years and has always been regarded as a special, not a permanent, measure. During the last election there was an urgent demand all over the country for the suppression of the tax, for none contributes more to the cost of living and none is more troublesome to commercial life.

During the financial year 1929–30 a total of 1,119,740 manufacturers and wholesale and retail business men paid the tax, which produced 10,803,000,000 francs (about $432,120,000). For each of these taxpayers the amount involved was relatively small, usually about 2 per cent of all sales. But when first the manufacturer, then the wholesaler, and then the retailer has each paid a 2 per cent tax the price of any article to the consumer begins to increase beyond all reason.

In a majority of cases in France the tax is paid monthly on the basis of the previous month's turnover. A special bureau of revenue officers has charge of these tax accounts and the officers have authority to investigate the books of any company or trader suspected of fraud. Most small businesses, like little shopkeepers doing a business of less than $2,000 a year, pay a forfeit.

The tax is not applied to agriculture or merchandise exported either to the colonies or abroad. On the other hand, certain industries, such as soap and oil manufacturers, pay the whole 6 per cent.

In some luxury trades the tax rises as high as 3 or even 6 per cent; and when 6 per cent is added to each sale operation, the cost of de luxe articles is considerably increased over their cost in other countries where the sales tax is not applied.

The French Government officials admit that while the sales tax is excellent as a revenue producer, it has two great disadvantages: First, the cost of collection is considerable and necessitates an increasing revenue staff. Second, the income from the tax fluctuates with the volume of business.

In France, where the amount collected represents one-fifth of the total budget, the result during the past two years of depression has been that the revenue from this tax has fallen far below the estimates, and the decline has been largely responsible for the budget deficit. During the current year the falling off is expected to be even greater.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than five or six minutes, realizing the lateness of the hour and the weariness of us all.

I have voted in the consideration of this tax bill very consistently with the committee report and under the impulse of duty. It seemed to me that it was my duty to support the bill, regardless of personal objections, because it was the only bill before us; it was approved by a great committee; and amendments and discussions tended to delay at a time when I think we all must have realized that expedition was indispensable to the welfare of the country.

I regard a great many of these special excise taxes as obnoxious, as vexatious, and as utterly ineffectual. Now that this amendment is before us, I am put to the choice between what is known as the manufacturers' limited excise tax and this long series of vexatious, obnoxious, injurious, and ineffectual excise taxes.

I shall make my choice according to my judgment. I shall vote for the substitute offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts. I am going to test the matter with just a few questions and with no discussion of the questions.

Which of the two taxes—or the two sets, if I may use the expression—is the more certain to raise the revenue? Shall we look to the whole superstructure of America's industrial life in this time of uncertainty or shall we look to a few special sources?

Again, which of the two sets will produce the most revenue; a low rate on the manufacturer's output, exclusive of food and of low-priced clothing and of medicine and of fertilizers and of farmers' supplies and of workingmen's tools, all the rest and the remainder of our industrial output being taxed at the point of the finished product—which will raise the most revenue; a tax so broad and universal, or a tax limited to a few articles?

I do not think I have to answer the question. The difference is the difference between a general rain and a street sprinkler.

Which of the two taxes will interfere least with business? That is a matter of primary concern here. The great problem in America to-day is to get money in circulation. So far as I know, there is nothing on earth that will circulate money except profitable enterprise. Which of these two forms of taxation will tend the least to press against the profitableness of enterprise—a low rate on a broad and wide-sweeping structure, a rate of only 1¾ per cent, easily borne and easily absorbed and quick to disappear, or high percentage rates on a series of special subjects of taxation?

Which of the two will give America and the world assurance that the Government of the United States means not just to make a gesture by way of balancing her Budget but means actually to balance it?

It was the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] the other day who said that all the nations of the earth were looking to the Senate of the United States. I think that is true; but what comes home to me in an hour like this is that 120,000,000 American men and women and children are looking to the Senate. They were looking back yonder, some months ago, with hope, and a little later with expectation, and more recently with impatience, and to-night with wonder and, I fear, with despair.

There are legislators who seem to have a fear of those 120,000,000 men and women and children in America, a proper fear which I would not criticize; but I believe that this American people is to-day as capable of solidarity and of greatness and of faith and of sacrifice as it ever was in all its past, as capable as it was in the great day when we went forth to determine the World War.

I believe, and I would trust myself with that belief, that if we should impose this general, limited, manufacturers' excise tax it would reach out lightly; and even though it touched millions of people, they would rejoice in their opportunity to make a contribution to the welfare of our country in a time like this.

Which would give greater assurance, a low tax on a broad base or high percentages on a narrow base? I do not have to answer the question.

I ask another question, Which of these two forms of taxes would tend to support the program of relief into which we must go within the next few days? I do not hesitate to say that that program can not be projected upon these special taxes, and I do say that it would rest upon a solid foundation if it were based upon this general, light but far-sweeping and broad tax.

Again, which of the two taxes would prove less obnoxious? Consider that for a moment. We are going into the admission-tax business, we are going into the tariff-tax business, we are going into the stamp-tax business, we are going into the conveyance-tax business, we are going into the bank check-tax business, we are going into every conceivable form of nuisance and vexatious taxes. On the other hand, we are offered a tax which would raise quite as much money and raise it more easily and more surely and vex nobody on earth.

Finally, where would the burden of the two taxes fall? I do not hesitate to say, Mr. President, that the burden of this series of excise taxes would fall more heavily on the poor of America than would the burden of the limited manufacturers' excise tax.

Who will pay the tax on gasoline? It is my judgment that if there is one class of men on earth more entitled to use an automobile or truck than another, if there is one class of men to whom the truck or the automobile is more indispensable than to another, it is the farmer. Do they plow their fields to-day, they plow them with gasoline. Do they haul their supplies, their fertilizers, and their implements to the farm, they haul them with gasoline. Do they market their crops, their livestock, their butter, their milk, and their poultry, they market them with gasoline.

When we impose this tax on gasoline we impose a tax of from 5 to 6 or 7 per cent per gallon, 1 cent in 12 or 1 cent in 16, as the price may be, according to locality, upon every gallon that turns the wheels of the farmer's trucks or pulls the farmer's plow or hauls his produce to market at a time when it is well known and when many of us are very often reminded that it is exceedingly doubtful whether there is a farmer in the United States who is making the slightest profit upon his labor from sun to sun and month to month and year to year.

Now consider the bank-check tax. Upon whom does that fall? Does it fall upon the man who has a great bank account, or upon the thousands of people who are trying to save a little in the small bank? At a time when every one of us is undertaking to encourage our people to save money, and to put it in a bank, at a time when the temptation not to put money in banks is a little bit greater than any of us would like to have it, we put a tax upon those who undertake to save money, and we charge them a price for putting their money in the bank, and, at the same time, we put on a campaign urging them to do that very thing.

Who pays the movie tax? The poor. The rich people do not go to movie places. They can find their diversions at Palm Beach or Newport. They can have their grand operas. But if the wives of the poor and the children of the poor are to have surcease from toil and release from the cares of the day, whatever else we may say about the movies, they are the places where the families of the poor can gather for their entertainments.

I could go through the whole list. Who pays the tariff tax? The poor. Who pays the tax on the automobile? All this talk about a man living in luxury because he has an automobile is an absurdity. We see them in the streets wherever we go. An automobile is not a badge of wealth.

Who pays the communication tax? The great middle class of America. Who uses the telephone? Who uses the telegraph? If those institutions depended upon the people of wealth to maintain them, they would not have one-tenth of the mileage they have at the present time.

There is levied a conveyance tax, and a power tax, which will be passed on to the mill and the little home. In my State the cotton mills, which use the power, have been running for a year merely in the interest of keeping their workers alive, not to make money. The cotton mill has ceased to be the picture of an industry in North Carolina. It is the picture of an institution around which are gathered a few people who are kept alive by the operation of the motor and the turning of the spindles.

Mr. President, there are other reasons I could give as to why the Senate should agree to this amendment, but these are enough. I shall vote for this tax, in the assurance that it is the better tax, that it is the wiser tax, that it is the least obnoxious tax, that it is a tax before this body which would rest less heavily upon business than any other tax proposed and rest more lightly upon the poor of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in order that the RECORD may be clear, I would like to refer to the introduction into the RECORD a moment ago by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] of an article from the New York Times pointing out the fact that the sales tax in France was unpopular. The sales tax in France referred to is the turnover tax, which no one is proposing and no one favors in the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY (when his name was called). I have a pair on this vote with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I understand if present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If that Senator were present, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], who is absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. PATTERSON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a special pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I understand that on this question he would vote "nay" if present. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." If the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DICKINSON. I desire to announce the pair of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. If the senior Senator from Iowa were present, he would vote "nay"; and if the senior Senator from Colorado were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG];

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL];

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

If present and voting, Senators BAILEY, WATERMAN, GLENN, LOGAN, DAVIS, PATTERSON, and TOWNSEND would vote "yea"; and

If present and voting, Senators BORAH, BROOKHART, LONG, SCHALL, HULL, SWANSON, and MCKELLAR would vote "nay."

Mr. GLENN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is necessarily absent. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 53, as follows:

So the amendment proposed by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts was rejected.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, a brief word is in order explaining why an amendment intended to be proposed by myself, printed and lying on the table, is not being pressed at this time.

It will be recalled that some days ago the question arose as to what prospect there was for the consideration of the so-called three farm organizations bill, which has been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and is on the calendar. It was this bill which I had offered in the form of an amendment.

I sought to obtain a unanimous-consent agreement that the Congress would not adjourn until there had been a vote recorded upon the measure. It will be remembered that objection was raised. At the time it was suggested that there could be assurance given that opportunity would be afforded before adjournment for a vote on the measure, and because the leadership on each side of the aisle in this Chamber has given such emphatic assurance that we would not be denied an opportunity to vote upon the measure I am declining to offer my proposed amendment at this time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there has been much criticism of the Senate in the press and elsewhere concerning the time which it has consumed in the consideration of the bill now about to pass. It seems appropriate at this time to call attention to the fact that the revenue bill of 1918 took 10 days in the Senate before it passed and was sent to conference. The revenue bill of 1921 took 40 days in the Senate before it was passed and sent to conference. The revenue bill of 1924 took 14 days in the Senate before it was passed and sent to conference. The revenue bill of 1928 took 16 days before it passed the Senate and went to conference. The bill which is now about to be put upon its passage took just 15½ days in the Senate.

I ask that a statement touching the various bills to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word with reference to my vote on the pending measure. If the roll is called, I shall not vote for the bill for two reasons—first of all because it contains tariff items which I think are absolutely indefensible; and, secondly, because, in my judgment, the Budget is not balanced with the revenue we now have with the defeat of the sales tax.

I feel that when the next fiscal year comes we shall be in the position of having told the country that we have balanced the Budget only to have the country undeceived within the next 30 or 60 days. In the face of that unbalanced Budget, we are going out to sell relief bonds to the country in an unbalanced Budget market which ultimately are going to cost the American taxpayer much more than he believes.

Therefore not being able to vote for the bill and wishing that I could correct it, I am going to ask that when the roll is called I may be excused from voting, as I do not wish to vote to pass the bill when revenue of some kind may be needed. I ask unanimous consent that I may answer "present" when the roll is called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I want to enter a most emphatic dissent to what the Senator has just said. We are assured by the Treasury that we have amply provided for the needs of the Government in the coming fiscal year; that the estimate takes account of all the falling off of business up to the present time; that we can depend upon it that the Budget is balanced, provided only that we shall stand substantially for the economy bill which our nonpartisan and bipartisan committee is now getting ready to report. I believe that most of us feel in the utmost sincerity, whether or not we agree upon the details of the bill, that we have produced a bill that does honestly balance the National Budget.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I wondered how the Senator from Pennsylvania could speak so confidently about the matter. Certainly we will not have balanced the Budget unless we do pass the economy bill practically as it is presented, and inasmuch as there has been quite a decided division in the committee itself, nobody can assure the country that we are going to pass the economy bill practically as it is presented. I frankly say I do not believe we will have balanced the Budget even if we pass the economy bill, and I do not intend to vote for the pending bill, because, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] so amply expressed it, it contains tariff taxes that are indefensible.

Mr. REED. Regardless of whether or not the Senator thinks the tariff taxes are defensible, assuming that we go through with the next step and pass an economy bill carrying substantially $300,000,000 worth of savings—and that I understand is what the committee proposes to submit—the American people may rest assured that the Budget is balanced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused from voting.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there will be one fortunate thing resulting, and that is that if the entire program of economy is not adopted, we shall still be in session to enact some other legislation. The danger of the situation was that we would be deceived to adjourn and not be here for the purpose of doing those things which are essential to provide the Government with revenue.

At the time some of the press of the country was criticizing the Congress for delay, Congress was giving careful thought and study to whether the estimates of the Treasury Department were correct and whether the funds proposed to be raised through the measures considered by Congress would "balance the Budget," as it has come to be called. It was discovered by the other House that the estimates of the Treasury Department were incorrect. That was called to the attention of the Treasury Department, and further estimates were required and were given. Had Congress passed the bill as recommended by the Treasury Department at that time and adjourned and gone home, it would have been essential for the President of the United States to call a special session of Congress.

Again the committee reported to the Senate a bill carrying the funds recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ogden Mills, two or three weeks ago. Members of the committee, including the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and myself, did not believe that it would raise the necessary funds. It was the discussion and consideration of that matter by this body which finally led to the new estimate by the Treasury Department on yesterday disclosing the fact that it would require $285,000,000 more than believed necessary at the time of the previous estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. There was not the slightest hesitation in facing the facts when we did not believe that the bill as it stood yesterday did balance the Budget?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not the slightest. I am simply stating this in defense of the Senate. Members of this body did not believe that the excise taxes then proposed would raise sufficient revenue to "balance the Budget," as it is called, and therefore the position of Senators was insisted upon in spite of the fact that some of the great financiers of the country and some of the press of the country insisted that we should vote the bill through as it was given to us. If we had voted as it was insisted we should do, the minute the bill was reported out of the Finance Committee and as it was, and had then adjourned, we would have left here with a known deficit of $285,000,000, even including the economy reductions.

So I say it is a fortunate thing that both the House of Representatives and the United States Senate used their judgment and had the courage to back that judgment and not adjourn and go home and then probably have to be called back here again in special session. Now, we will vote to pass the revenue bill, and we will vote for the economy measure. If that is passed in the form provided, the Budget will probably be substantially balanced. If we do not do that, we are still here for the purpose of raising additional funds from some other source.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah how much revenue we have provided to-day by what we have done?

Mr. SMOOT. I believe it is $281,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. What economies must we exercise, then, in order to fully balance the Budget?

Mr. SMOOT. Approximately $300,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. The bill which will be presented by the Economy Committee carries $238,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It carries $231,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. It provides for $231,000,000.

Mr. REED. But there are other economies to be made through the appropriation bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair again expresses the hope that Senators desiring to interrupt will first address the Chair. There can be no order unless that is done. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The economy bill, as the Senator knows, carries an estimated saving of $231,000,000. There are several provisions of the bill that are vehemently controverted, involving in one instance alone some $51,000,000, that may be stricken out here in the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, even though it is late and we are anxious to go, I do think we ought to know the facts about it. The total amount was $289,000,000 and $51,000,000 we agreed not to report, so we have $238,000,000 now. I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Utah how we are going to get the remainder necessary fully to balance the Budget?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. REED. We are going to get it by the economies to be made in many appropriation bills that are to come right along.

Mr. COPELAND. I take it, from what the Senator says, that, in order to have the Budget fully balanced, we shall have to bring about economies to the extent of $300,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. REED. Between $250,000,000 and $300,000,000. I do not carry the exact figures in my head.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that if the Economy Committee does its duty—and I do not want to be critical at all—it will report a saving of at least $300,000,000; and if it does not do that, then we shall have the appropriation bills before us, and we can very easily bring about economies of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 in considering them.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I want to say——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COPELAND. I shall yield in a moment. I want to say for the bipartisan committee, which reported to-day to the full Appropriations Committee, that it has done a fine piece of work and it ought to be complimented. I am sorry that the reductions recommended by them are not greater and that it will be necessary for us to pare the appropriation bills considerably in order to provide the necessary additional saving required to balance the Budget. It would not be right for us to think that by the measure we have passed to-night we shall have raised sufficient money to balance the Budget.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair make a statement of the question. The question is, Shall the amendments be ordered engrossed and the bill to be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? The yeas and nays have been requested. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is unavoidably absent. I am advised that, if present, he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Under the unanimous-consent agreement of a few moments ago, I ask to be recorded as "present."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland will be so recorded.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], if present, would vote "yea."

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

The result was announced—yeas 72, nays 11, as follows:

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably sundry nominations of midshipmen to be second lieutenants in the Marine Corps, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

FARM AND LABOR RELIEF

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several editorials appearing in the American Labor Banner dealing with the subject of depreciated currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorials are as follows:

[Editorial from American Labor Banner, May 28, 1932]

LABOR AND FARMER DEPENDENT UPON SENATE FOR HELP

Hundreds of thousands of skilled American workers who are either without employment or justly fearful of being deprived of employment opportunity, due entirely to the effects of the depreciated currencies of those foreign countries from which we yearly import many millions of dollars' worth of articles which are competitive in the American market with the products of American workers, anxiously await the action of the United States Senate.

Not only are hundreds of thousands of American workers apprehensive over the loss of their employment opportunity, but they do not understand the hesitancy of the Senate to enact this legislation which will help protect the employment of American workers and at the same time positively add more than one hundred and twenty-five additional millions of dollars in revenue to the Treasury each year. There are many items in the pending tax bill which no one will suggest will yield a total of $125,000,000 in taxes each year.

Of course, this would place a burden on the shoulders of foreigners instead of Americans. Surely, such can not be the answer to the hesitancy of those Senators who are inclined to vote against an amendment to the tax bill which would instruct the Treasury Department to collect as a surtax the difference between the normal or gold value of imported articles and the present depreciated value of foreign currencies?

Legislation such as is requested by American labor and American farmers would help all sections of the country. The products of the factories of New England would be helped, but so also would the products of factories of all other sections of our country. The products of the Southland would also be helped in that commodities from Japan and India, and from other countries, the currency of which has depreciated, which compete in the American market with the products of the South, would also be taxed. At the present time articles and commodities imported from Japan, India, England, to mention but a few of those nations, the currencies of which have depreciated some 30 per cent, would be taxed to that extent. Surely such action is most desirable at this time.

While American shop and factory production has declined more than 40 per cent, imports of articles and commodities from those countries which have gone off the gold standard and the currencies of which have depreciated as high as 35 per cent, have decreased only 10 per cent.

The tariff group of the American Federation of Labor and the American Farm Bureau Federation have jointly appealed to the Senate to pass an amendment such as is herein suggested.

Senator DAVID A. REED has presented an amendment which, with the elimination of a few words, would greatly help American workers in that it would insure to American workers an opportunity of employment, would provide a market in America for the products of American farms, and would add not less than $125,000,000 yearly to the Treasury, and would thus help to balance the Budget.

Labor and farmer are both looking for constructive action on the part of those Senators who are actually interested in helping to provide employment for American workers, to provide a purchasing market for the products of the American farmers, and which will not add any additional tax on American products or American taxpayers.

[Editorial from American Labor Banner, May 14, 1932]

AMERICANISM v. ALIEN INFLUENCES

The United States Senate has under consideration and pending before it a revenue bill through which it is intended to raise more than $1,000,000,000 in taxes.

This bill has many faults. It is the result of considerable deliberation on the part of members of the Finance Committee and no doubt represents an honest effort on the part of the members of the Finance Committee to draft a revenue bill which would secure the support of a sufficient number of votes in the Senate to pass.

There are many millions of American workers totally unemployed. There are additional millions working on part time. The army of the unemployed is increasing instead of decreasing.

Congress itself is partly to blame for many thousands being unemployed and will be more responsible in later months as additional hundreds of thousands of workers find that they have been denied employment.

Congress claims that it is looking for taxes. Why is it that they have deliberately overlooked the collection of more than $125,000,000 in customs taxes which Congress intended should be collected? Why should aliens be allowed to pay customs taxes on the basis of the values of depreciated currency and expect Americans to pay their taxes on gold basis?

Congressional leaders insist that America remain on the gold standard. With this we have no complaint. Yet, with 11 or 12, and perhaps more, foreign nations off the gold standard and shipping their products into America, securing entry on the payments of customs duties of some 30 per cent less than Congress intended should be collected has resulted in the loss of employment of many hundreds of thousands of American workers.

The Treasury will secure yearly an additional $125,000,000 in taxes by the Senate writing into the pending revenue bill directions to the Treasury Department to collect customs duties on the basis of the normal or gold values of foreign currencies. Hundreds of thousands of skilled American workers will retain or secure profitable employment if this action is taken. Such action does not call for the increasing or the decreasing of any tariff rate.

Surely, the benefits which are to be derived from such action on the part of the Senate warrant American workers wondering why this action is not taken.

Foreign nations, with goods to sell, international bankers with money to collect from foreigners who offer merchandise in payment instead of cash, naturally are opposed to the action which labor has asked the Members of the Senate to take.

Those Members of the Senate who are sincerely interested in Americanism, who are sincerely interested in helping American workers find employment, who are interested solely in the success and prosperity of their own country should not hesitate to comply with labor's request.

[Editorial from American Labor Banner, April 30, 1932]

WILL THE SENATE RISE TO THE OCCASION?

Labor, seeking to retain continued employment for American workers and to obtain employment opportunities for the millions of workers unable to secure employment, has appealed to the members of the Senate Finance Committee for the insertion of language in the revenue bill which will protect the employment opportunities of hundreds of thousands of American industrial workers.

Every thoughtful citizen, interested in the welfare of America, hesitates to think of what will happen in the industrial centers of our country next winter unless something is done to correct the present deplorable conditions, which are steadily growing worse.

Unemployed workers, with families destitute and hungry, with community chests empty, private charities and cities and towns unable to continue to extend relief, will not hesitate to take desperate means to help themselves and their starving families.

American labor can well question the Americanism of those who so willingly extend aid to foreign governments, but who refuse to help their own countrymen.

There is no political question involved in labor's requests.

Compliance with labor's request will not mean any change in any tariff rate; it does not necessarily mean any discussion of tariff rates or policies.

Labor has pointed out two practical methods by which Congress can materially provide profitable employment for millions of American industrial workers.

First. Protect the employment opportunities of American workers by eliminating the present handicap on the sale of the products of American workers caused by the depreciation of foreign currencies. This will help American labor and will help the Treasury by forcing the payment of customs duties which Congress intended on dutiable goods.

Second. Legalize the manufacture and sale of 2.75 per cent nonintoxicating beer which will provide almost instant employment for hundreds of thousands of unemployed American workers, will eliminate the control of Government and public officials by gangsterism, and will permit of the collection of hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes by the Federal, State, and city governments.

Labor will watch with great interest the answer which the Senate will make to labor's constructive suggestions.

[Editorial from American Labor Banner, April 16, 1932]

DEPRECIATED FOREIGN CURRENCIES AND ITS EFFECT IN ENFORCED IDLENESS OF AMERICAN WORKERS

Hundreds of thousands of idle and distressed American workers everywhere are amazed at the seeming willingness of Congress to permit America to continue to be used as the virtual dumping ground for the products of the underpaid workers of foreign countries.

With the currencies of England, Japan, and other nations now off the gold standard selling in the world markets for only 70 per cent or less of their normal value, American importers and international bankers, interested solely in exploitation for their personal enrichment, have found it profitable to increase quantity imports of the products of foreign labor, while American workers, millions of them with hungry mouths to feed, are unable to secure work.

Despite the present depression, Government figures show that our decline in quantity imports, as compared with a year ago, is only 10 per cent. Compare this decline in quantity imports—quantity means employment to workers—with the decline of from 50 to 80 per cent in our American industrial productivity, and it won't take any expert to realize why hundreds of thousands of American workers are dependent upon public or private charity.

The workers are asking, "Why doesn't Congress act now? Why should an American Congress hesitate to adopt legislation specifying that the products of American labor be given preference in the American market?"

The Senate Finance Committee has the opportunity to render a real service in the way of providing employment opportunity for American workers. The Finance Committee can recommend and Congress will accept the recommendation that the Treasury Department be directed, in the pending revenue bill, to enforce the intent of Congress, as made plain in the present tariff act, and collect customs duties on the basis of the normal value of foreign currencies. This action would immediately remove some of the advantages now employed by the importers of the products of foreign labor through the depreciation of foreign currencies.

To illustrate, the imports from England of only five commodities were landed at American ports last December and delivered to American importers at a direct loss of revenue to the United States Treasury of some $250,000, due entirely to the depreciation of English money. This means a loss in revenue of more than $3,000,000 in revenue each year on these five items alone.

Instead of the imposition of nuisance taxes to raise revenue, why not collect from the importers of the products of foreigr workers the customs duties which Congress has called for?

In addition to the loss of revenue to the Government, these commodities, the product of foreign labor, could be sold to American wholesale and retail merchants, with a profit to the American importers, at prices which are less than the cost of producing similar articles the product of American labor.

The action which we suggest does not necessitate the changing of any tariff rates at this time.

We sincerely hope that the members of the Finance Committee will help American labor; will help American industries; will help the Treasury Department by placing in the pending revenue bill the suggestion we have made.

We agree that the Budget shall be balanced.

We believe that the Budget can be balanced with more profit to the American people as a whole if Congress will remove the present handicap placed on American labor and American industry by directing the Treasury to collect customs duties on the basis of the normal value of foreign currencies.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. Francis J. Hurney, pastor of the Immaculate Conception Church of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, the Creator and Ruler of the Universe, we bow our heads before Thee in acknowledgment of Thy sovereignty and in gratitude for Thy divine providence which watches over us lovingly in Thy rule.

We beseech Thee send Thy divine light to direct the deliberations of this Congress, which more than any other in our history is faced with problems upon whose solution depends the welfare of our people.

In calling for a world-wide supplication to Thy throne, Pius XI has voiced the distress of nations in these words: "Distress has increased, the number of unemployed has grown in practically all parts, and subversive elements are making use of the fact for their propaganda; hence public order is threatened more and more and the peril of terrorism and anarchy hangs over society more than ever."

In this our extremity we send forth to the gates of heaven a cry of supplication that in all decisions made by this august body, devoted as they are to the best interests of Thee and our country, Thou wilt lead and guide and guard.

This we ask through Jesus Christ Thy Son. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, May 27, 1932, was read and approved.

SPEAKER: Pursuant to law, I am advising you by the attached list of names of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives who have been designated by me to constitute on the part of that committee the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point for the current year, 1932.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a further communication:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 26, 1932.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am in receipt of House Resolution 213, dated May 14, 1932, requesting that if not incompatible with the public interest I submit to the House of Representatives, as soon as practicable, all the testimony, evidence, exhibits, documents, and records presented in or pertaining to the investigation conducted under the authority of the antidumping act, 1921, relating to the importation of ammonium sulphate.

In passing the antidumping act the Congress decided to provide that the initial decisions as to the existence of dumping should be made by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with administrative procedure. It has been the practice of the department in acting under this statute to treat all information furnished by interested persons as confidential and not to disclose it unless such persons consent to the disclosure. This practice is founded upon the necessity for the department to obtain complete information concerning manufacturers' and importers' business transactions which it would be practically impossible to obtain if those furnishing the information did not understand it would be treated as confidential and not divulged without their consent.

As consent has not been given to the disclosure of the information contained in the record before the Treasury Department, I am of the opinion that it would be incompatible with the public interest to comply with the request contained in the resolution.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Ways and Means Committee and ordered printed.

COMMON SENSE IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by printing the speech of ex-Senator James A. Reed delivered at St. Louis, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES A. REED AT DINNER GIVEN BY MISSOURI DEMOCRATIC DELEGATION, CORONADA HOTEL, ST. LOUIS, MO., MAY 14, 1932

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

Common sense is merely sound judgment applied to existing conditions of life.

Common-sense government does not undertake to create impossible Utopias or waste its energies in vain attempts to remake the world or to alter the course of human nature. It deals with conditions as they exist and seeks in a practical way to produce the best possible result with the materials at hand.

Common sense in government, to my mind, requires a return to the original principles upon which this Nation was founded.

To appreciate how far we have departed from the old fundamentals, consider the basic difference between despotic and free government.

PATERNALISM

Always there have been two opposing theories of government—the paternalistic and the individualistic.

Paternalism is based upon the dogma that the people are incapable of properly regulating their lives or governing themselves; that from the cradle to the grave men should be ward and slave of government.

That was the creed of all despotisms which have cursed the earth.

The individualist asserts that man is entitled to control his own affairs, and that government was created to protect him in his right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That was the creed of the founders of this Republic.

Regardless of its name, a government which interferes with these natural rights and assumes the prerogative of paternalism is, to that extent, despotic.

There are men in public life constantly invoking the memory of Jefferson, of Jackson, and of Lincoln in support of doctrines which must cause these mighty dead to rest uneasy in their graves.

Jefferson taught that it was the business of government to protect the individual so that he could exercise his natural talents and just desires without official oppression or private despoliation; that government should, therefore, be simple and its powers strictly limited.

He held that nation best governed whose people were least governed. He maintained that the government of a free people must be purely protective; that it never should be regulatory.

Governmental paternalism and individual liberty can not exist at the same time.

A paternalistic government is necessarily oppressive. In order for government to confer benefactions upon a part of the people it must, of necessity, wrongfully take the property of the rest of the people. That is robbery.

In order for government to regulate the business, lives, or habits of the people it must substitute for the free will of the citizen the command of those clothed with temporary power. That is tyranny. Such was the prerogative asserted by kings and emperors.

If these principles are unsound, then the teachings of the fathers of the Republic are false—man is incapable of self-government—and liberty is a foolish dream.

But if they are sound, it follows that paternalism can not be tolerated in the government of a free people.

The intelligent student of recent years must realize that we have lost sight of the old landmarks and are drifting upon the seas of paternalism toward the reefs of socialism and bolshevism.

By insensible processes we have come to regard the Federal Government as one of unlimited authority, possessed of exhaustless resources and endowed with infallible wisdom.

Without so admitting we are nevertheless acting upon the theory that the Federal Government should stand as guardian at large for the entire population.

Similarly a persistent effort is being made to have the United States assume guardianship over "all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues of the earth."

The country is overrun with quacks, political, professional, and legislative, each ready to prescribe remedies for all ills which afflict us in particular and mankind in general.

Almost without exception these "remedies" are more deadly than any disease with which we are or can be afflicted.

Many people look upon Uncle Sam as a "brother bountiful," possessed of an inexhaustible treasury created by magic and endowed with Divine wisdom.

The executive and legislative agencies of Government seem obsessed with the same philosophy, and act as though "money grows upon trees" and the Government "owns the forests of the world."

Manifestly the danger of our Government blundering into the morass of socialism and bolshevism was never so menacing as at the present hour.

Abandoning the calm courage and deliberate judgment so essential in times of stress or danger we have given way to excitement and hysteria. We are ready to disown the Constitution and embrace any heresy proposed, without pausing to consider its poisonous nature.

Admitting that industry and commerce are sick, I yet assert that the patients can not be cured by dosing them with poisonous nostrums proposed by demagogue agitators, socialist propagandists, and bolshevist doctrinaires.

Witness the spectacle: A prominent conservative Senator is, from the floor of the Senate, declaring to all the world:

"What the United States needs is a Mussolini."

Behold again: A radical Senator is asserting to his people upon the hustings:

"The power of taxation should be employed to redistribute the wealth of this country."

The first proposition means the death of liberty, the substitution of the arbitrary dictation of one man for the sovereign will of 125,000,000 free men and free women.

The second means the confiscation and largely the destruction by the Government of all forms of private property. It is in some respects more extreme and foolish than anything advocated by Lenin, Trotsky, or Stalin.

These are not mere individual utterances. The former has to some extent been indorsed by a portion of the press. The latter has found support in principle by Members of Congress who advocate extreme and confiscatory taxes.

The advocates of such un-American doctrines have their remedy. They can emigrate to Italy, don black shirts, and swear allegiance to Mussolini, or they may find a welcome under the red flag of Russia. It is only a matter of choice.

I am not disturbed by such foolish maunderings. The American people love their institutions, are passionately proud of their liberties, and have the common sense to reject with contempt all such doctrines and all such teachers.

Bad as conditions are, our situation is far from hopeless. We have the richest land in the world, and, non obstante the financial calamities, we possess more wealth than any nation. So advantaged, we are certain to triumph over adversity.

In due course of time prosperity will return. But the return to prosperity will come from the grass roots.

We are suffering not from a want of the necessities and even the luxuries of life but from a disarrangement and temporary paralysis of the economic machinery. That unfortunate condition may be largely traced to governmental blunders, both domestic and foreign.

The condition is aggravated by the intemperate agitation and fallacious schemes of the administration and Congress.

It is laid down among the fundamentals that wealth can not be created by law. If it could, we would assemble our legislative bodies, all quit work, and foregather at the public feed trough.

Per contra, government is primarily a pauper. It possesses nothing save that which it has, by force of law, taken from the people.

Government lives upon the people. The people can not live upon that which government takes from them.

Money is the coined sweat of labor. For every dollar of wealth, somebody's back has bent in toil, somebody has endured the agony of effort.

No government can promote prosperity by taxing the people to death.

All taxes, in the last analysis, are drawn from the veins of industry.

Excessive taxes inevitably result in limiting production and consumption, in closing down mills and factories, and in the consequent discharge of labor.

No greater calamity can befall our laboring class than, by excessive taxation, to so handicap productive agencies that they can not gain and hold a fair share of the world's business.

But while government can not produce wealth, it can waste the taxes wrung from the people. It can limit production, interfere with business, discourage enterprise and destroy that confidence essential to prosperity.

A candid examination of some of the causes of our present difficulties (and I can only refer to a few) will, I think, demonstrate that the major difficulties of the world are directly traceable to bad government.

Regardless of primary responsibility, the World War must be attributed to the mistakes of one or several governments.

It disrupted the financial and economic structure of the world.

It brought in its wake a new brood of pestilential evils.

The creative power of Germany was largely impaired. Austria was dismembered. Little states and little governments were set up.

Each of these governments at once erected tariff barriers so high as to make commerce difficult or impossible.

So that all European nations find their industries crippled and their trade territory impaired or disrupted.

Upon our part, we foolishly enacted a tariff substantially prohibitive. Retaliatory tariffs have largely barred us from the markets of Europe. Canada, our best customer and neighbor, is closing the door in our face.

The effect of these exorbitant tariff barriers is to block the highways of the world at the borders of each state.

Industrial paralysis, partial or total, was and is the inevitable result.

When we built our tariff wall we forgot that a wall which keeps out the products of the other countries keeps in the products of our own country.

In a word, when we discriminated against other countries we discriminated against ourselves.

American industry can not be fully revived, American labor can not be fully employed, until we are able to sell our surplus in the markets of the world. And that can not be accomplished as long as we refuse to buy from those to whom we would sell.

As a direct result of the false policy referred to, the very companies and individuals who have clamored that we must not subject American labor and capital to competition with foreign capital and labor are establishing great factories in every foreign land and employing the labor of those countries to supply the world market, thus cutting off our foreign market and correspondingly limiting the employment of American labor.

During and immediately succeeding the war our international bankers and financiers flooded the United States with foreign bonds and securities.

We sent abroad something like $17,000,000,000 to be loaned upon these securities. Thus we drained our country of that immense sum, which ought to have been invested at home.

An enormous portion of these bonds has either been defaulted or has fallen in price, their holders have lost billions of dollars, and the investment capital of the country is, to that extent, impaired.

In order to support these privately owned debts, their holders, headed by the international bankers, advocated the cancellation of the debts owed by foreign governments to the United States.

To get the money so loaned our Government borrowed from our people approximately $22,000,000,000.

Upon that stupendous sum we must pay interest and principal.

Yielding to the demands of the international bankers, the administration and Congress canceled substantially $11,000,000,000 of the foreign debt and postponed the payment of the principal for periods running as high as 66 years.

We thus transferred from the shoulders of European peoples to the backs of the American people a burden of $11,000,000,000 of principal and an annual interest charge of $500,000,000.

The pretense was that foreign governments were unable to pay.

But they can and do maintain standing armies and navies greater than existed before the World War.

Italy was let off for 21 cents on the dollar, upon the claim that she was bankrupt, but the dictator of Italy is expending countless millions of dollars in restoring the glories of ancient Rome and is rattling his sword in the ears of Europe.

Recently, when we were confronted with a deficit of $3,000,000,000, we graciously granted a moratorium on the payment of $270,000,000 (then due under the settlement) to Great Britain, France, and Italy, upon condition that they grant a similar moratorium to Germany.

In effect, our debtors are out nothing, and we assume the burden of carrying the German reparations for 12 months.

That sort of business accounts, in part, for our present financial difficulties.

The prohibitory laws destroyed the sixth largest industry of the United States, rendered obsolete and practically useless properties worth from twelve to fifteen billions of dollars, turned thousands of men out of employment, and deprived farmers of a market for millions of bushels of grain.

Regardless of the merits or demerits of prohibition, that sort of a surgical operation can not be performed upon the economic body without producing serious consequences.

That same law deprived the Federal Government, the States, and municipalitees of an annual revenue of more than one thousand million dollars.

Worse still, we turned the profits of the liquor business into the pockets of the bootlegger and the criminal.

In the enforcement of that law we expend per annum directly from fifty-five to sixty millions of dollars and indirectly from two hundred to three hundred millions.

TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS

Succeeding the war the Department of Justice loafed on the job while illegal combinations and conspiracies established monopolies, restrained trade, and, by unfair and oppressive practices, destroyed thousands of smaller industries.

Such combinations are the creatures of the law and yet, paradoxically, exist in violation of the law.

The magnitude of these combinations is in itself a menace, because their fall disturbs the entire financial structure. Their practices are abominable. They pollute politics, buy favors, bribe officials, corrupt governments, destroy rivals, and rob the people.

Two illustrations will suffice to graphically illustrate some of the operations of the masters of many great combinations:

The Insull combination controlled more than 5,000 utilities located in 32 States. It was capitalized at over $3,000,000,000.

The Radio Corporation of America was organized to monopolize aerial communication throughout the world. The hope of monopoly profits constituted almost its entire assets.

The masters of these and of many other great combinations rigged the market and unloaded their stocks upon millions of people at wildly unreasonable prices, with the result that the capital of banks and the fortunes of individuals were jeopardized, impaired, and destroyed.

The shock paralyzed industry and resulted in the discharge of millions of labor.

Such organizations are as dangerous in our midst as the camp of a hostile army.

If we are to restore sound conditions the law must be enforced and these illegal and dangerous conspiracies must be rendered impossible.

This is no attack upon honest capital. It is merely a demand that piracy shall be exterminated, so that the freedom of the industrial and economic seas shall be restored.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE ADMINISTRATION

Recognizing the dangerous conditions, especially those arising from the insane speculations of the market, students of finance and some important and honest financiers and industrialists sounded repeated warnings.

Their admonitions were at once negatived by the highest Government officials and the leaders of the Republican Party, who thereby encouraged the bulls as they rampaged through the bond and stock markets and, accordingly, are largely to blame for the subsequent disaster.

At the very apex of the speculative craze, President Coolidge assured the people that everything was safe, that "prosperity is here to stay," and advised them "not to sell our country short."

He specifically sanctioned pouring the vast resources of the Federal reserve banks into the already crazed market.

In his final message, written at a time when the stock exchange was running wild, Mr. Coolidge asserted:

"The country can regard the present with satisfaction, and anticipate the future with optimism."

Prior to that utterance, and persistently throughout the campaign of 1928, the administration and others, including the Vice President, declared that prosperity would continue if the Republican ticket was elected.

Mr. Otto Kahn was brought forward to declare that Mr. Hoover, through the Department of Commerce, has—

"secured the employment of 5,000,000 laborers, * * * and * * * done much to aid in widely diffusing prosperity, which has * * * filled the pockets of the people."

A month later Mr. Hoover modestly gave the credit to the Republican Party, of which he, of course, was the supreme constituent. He proclaimed:

"The Republican Party has restored 5,000,000 workers to employment and produced a fundamental program which made that employment secure."

In his acceptance speech Mr. Hoover said:

"The poorhouse is vanishing from amongst us. We shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this Nation."

Evidently God declined the partnership.

These statements were made when speculation had reached the degree of insanity. They helped to toll into the gambling hells millions of people who were thereby reduced to poverty.

Because of these official assurances, the bulls realized incalculable fortunes.

I assert that to boom the sale of a rotten stock, or of any stock at a fictitious value, is just as wicked as to lead a bear raid against honest securities.

After the collapse, Mr. Hoover told us prosperity was "just around the corner." Somebody keeps moving the corner.

In December, 1930, Mr. Hoover in a lucid interval announced this common-sense doctrine:

"Economic depression can not be cured by legislative action or executive pronouncement."

That was a complete repudiation of everything he had said before and of all his party had for 40 years claimed.

If common sense had been followed, the Government would have, at once, inaugurated a policy of rigid economy and reduced the burden of taxation. It would have recognized that to take from the citizen, struggling to maintain his business, a large share of his earnings was as injurious as the bleeding of a patient already exhausted by wounds.

HIGH TAXES AND INCREASED EXPENDITURES

Common sense recognizes that taxes are a tribute levied upon industry, and that in proportion to the amount levied, production is arrested and the employment of labor reduced.

Within a few weeks, after having declared that "Economic depression can not be cured by legislative action or executive pronouncement," we find Mr. Hoover attempting to do that very thing.

He demanded that the already overburdened Treasury should be further crippled by the expenditure of huge sums of money in the erection of palatial Government buildings, and in crowding forward a program of public works which had been intended to be distributed over a period of many years.

That is to say, the Budget was to be balanced and the deficit in the Treasury cured by incurring huge and unnecessary expenditures.

In the city of Washington, buildings were torn down and magnificent structures, rivaling extravagance of ancient and medieval monarchs, were projected and built.

We are erecting post offices and courthouses all over the United States, renting jails, and enlarging penitentiaries.

From Great Britain to Japan, in Arabia and distant parts of the earth we are erecting palaces in which to house the defeated politicians who represent us in foreign lands.

The structures thus created are not only nonproductive, but incur a perpetual expense.

The pretense was that the Government was thereby furnishing employment for American labor. Accordingly, it took the money from those who were employing labor, and impaired their ability to continue that employment.

There probably never was a more complete abandonment of practical common sense than, in a time of great depression and distress, and with a Budget unbalanced, to increase the gap between expenses and receipts by sinking the public revenues in nonproductive and ornate palaces.

SO-CALLED FARM RELIEF

We gave $500,000,000 to a board dominated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The money has been largely expended, farm prices have been destroyed, and wheat and livestock driven to the lowest prices known in the past hundred years.

When we remember that this money was largely expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, and that he is the author of the intelligent statement, "Droughts are a blessing to the farmer," we can readily understand why the Farm Board operations have been calamitous.

The accumulation of 300,000,000 bushels of wheat by the Farm Board, with the threat to dump it upon the market, necessarily broke the price of wheat throughout the world.

DESTRUCTION OF CONFIDENCE

The market crash and subsequent acts of our rulers destroyed confidence. Investment and enterprise were chilled, buyers became afraid to buy, manufacturers to produce, shippers to ship, builders to build, lenders of money to lend, and labor by the millions walk the streets in search of work.

Restore confidence and the wheels of industry will begin to revolve and business will revive. But confidence can not be restored by the adoption of the devices of the socialists, the communists, or the bolshevists.

SOCIALISTIC REMEDIES

This country is not ready to adopt the doctrine of Karl Marx or of Lenin and Stalin.

Confidence can not spring from the granting of Government privileges and favors. Such acts are, in their essence, socialistic and communistic.

Tariff is an indirect tribute levied upon all of the people for the benefit of a favored class.

Likewise the so-called farm relief involves the taxation of all the people in an attempt to benefit a part of the people by raising the price of farm products.

The proposal of a Missouri senatorial candidate for the creation of a "nonemployment fund" is, in essence the dole system, which has brought disaster wherever tried. The dole, old-age pensions, and kindred schemes, including the attempts to regulate childbirth and child bearing, are all of the same kidney.

They are essentially paternalistic—in essence, socialistic—and in some cases hardly distinguishable from bolshevism. They involve the thought that individualism is a failure and that the citizen must become the ward of the Government. Ex necessitate that means that the citizen must surrender his independence and become subject to the dictates of rulers.

All such devices involve the levying of burdensome taxation upon all producers. If carried into execution they will here, as they have in Europe, destroy the capacity of the employers of labor to keep labor employed.

They will make the Federal Government a sort af almshouse and transform the independent citizen into a ward of the state.

Neither can confidence be restored by preaching the doctrine that our civilization and our entire economic system is a failure, and that we should begin a series of experiments in the hope that we may blunder upon a remedy.

Such covert and indefinite statements are only calculated to increase the existing alarm. Thoughtful men inquire who is to perform these experiments. Upon what class of the people are the experimental operations to be performed? Will the patient get well or expire under the knife of the political surgeon?

I deny the right of any man, of the Congress, or of the President to experiment upon the American people. The people will close their wounds if demagogues and experimenters will retire and give them the opportunity. And they will preserve the Republic in fact as well as in name.

I again affirm that you can not make the people rich by taxing them to death.

You can not promote labor by closing the mills and factories in which labor is employed.

You can not restore prosperity by frightening every man to death who has a dollar.

Prosperity can not be created by the Federal Government. It must, I say again, come from the grass roots.

Our public officials are largely engaged in preaching the doctrine of "defeatism." Their wailings postpone the return of confidence.

Our conditions are bad, but they are being vastly exaggerated.

Men are to-day afraid to buy property, to make investments, to enlarge enterprises, or to do anything necessary to start again the wheels of production. The condition is not permanent.

Just now everybody is frightened by wild, speculative, and confiscatory governmental schemes.

If the menace of Washington could be removed I believe the people would take a long breath and industry would begin to revive.

This country is so great that it can not be permanently ruined, even by legislative or executive foolishness. It may be injured but it can not be destroyed.

I appeal for the return of common sense in government;

For the rejection of all revolutionary, socialistic, and bolshevistic doctrines and "remedies";

For employing the authority of the Government to protect the liberties of the people;

For the discharge of a swarm of tax eaters, of snoopers, and of spies;

For the abolition of boards and bureaus which devour the substance of the people; and

For the return to the States of the powers and duties originally there lodged by the Constitution of the United States.

Out of the present valley of depression the mighty energies of our people will ultimately carry us to the plains of prosperity and hope.

The flag still flies, and it will remain the flag of the Republic—the ensign of individual liberty.

THE LATE HON. WILLIAM D. VANDIVER

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is with sorrow that I am called upon to announce the death of Col. William D. Vandiver at his home in Columbia, Mo., on yesterday. Colonel Vandiver was born near Moorefield, Hardy County, Va. (now W. Va.), March 30, 1854, attended the common schools, and was graduated from Central College, Fayette, Mo., in 1877. He studied law and was later elected professor of natural sciences in Bellevue Institute, Caledonia, Mo., and soon became its president. Following this, he accepted the chair of science in the State normal school at Cape Girardeau, Mo., in 1889, and became its president in 1893. He was elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-fifth and to the three succeeding Congresses (March 4, 1897–March 3, 1905) and was not a candidate for renomination in 1904. He was chairman of the State executive committee in 1904; was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention at St. Louis in 1904 which nominated Alton B. Parker for President and Henry G. Davis for Vice President; was State insurance commissioner of Missouri in 1905–1909; delegate to the Democratic State conventions in 1896, 1898, 1918, and 1920, and served as chairman in 1918; vice president of the Central States Life Insurance Co., 1910–1912; Assistant Treasurer of the United States (in charge of Subtreasury in St. Louis), 1913–1921. He was president of the Missouri Society Sons of the American Revolution 1919–1921.

Colonel Vandiver was a man of fine mind and of distinguished appearance, much resembling Mark Twain. A popular platform speaker, Colonel Vandiver is said to have been the author of the Missouri "show me" slogan. The late Speaker Champ Clark credited him with originating the expression in an impromptu address delivered before a Philadelphia club in 1899: "I come from the country that raises corn, cotton, cockleburs, and Democrats; I'm from Missouri," he said, "and you've got to show me." While others have claimed credit for the authorship of this expression, now known the world over, it is generally believed that Mr. Vandiver was the first to give public utterance to it. He was a historian of ability and did much to develop an interest in local history and in the study of the history of his State.

HON. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, my good and distinguished friend, Mr. HARE, chairman of the Insular Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, has asked me to say something to-day about another very distinguished man who recently left the House of Representatives, Hon. Felix Cordova Davila, who for a number of years very ably represented his island in this House.

In these closing days of the session it has been thought fitting by our committee that some brief memorial to his very distinguished services should find a permanent place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Judge Davila is in simple truth a distinguished man, distinguished in his profession as a lawyer, in his love of and service to literature, and in the arduous work which he performed here on behalf of his beloved island. As a young man he saw the sovereignty of Puerto Rico transferred from Spain to the United States. He, like all of the people of that island, transferred gladly, willingly, and enthusiastically his allegiance to the United States. We know too little of Puerto Rico. We know too little of its people. It is an integral part of the United States, just as is the District of Columbia. Judge Davila felt that that island should be the connecting link between the English-speaking Republic of the north and the Latin countries to the south. It is their hope that Puerto Rico should act in a way as an interpreter between the people of the two continents.

Felix Cordova Davila was born in Vega Baja, P. R., November 20, 1878. He received his primary education in the public schools of Manati, P. R. When 20 years of age, came to the United States and in the city of Washington, D. C., entered the National University law school; graduated from this institution with the degrees of bachelor and master of laws; returned to Puerto Rico, and after being admitted to the supreme court of the island undertook the practice of the law. In 1904 was appointed judge of the court of Caguas, and subsequently in the same year judge of the municipal court of Manatí, serving in this capacity until 1908. The same year he was renominated as judge of the municipal court of Manatí; also nominated as candidate for the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico, but declined both offices. He was appointed temporary district attorney for the district of Aguadilla; served in this capacity for a short time, and was then successively appointed judge for the district court of Guayama, district court of Arecibo, and finally for the first section of the district court of San Juan, serving in this capacity for a period of over 12 years. Because of his reputation as a poet, he was selected as a member of the Antillian Academy. In 1917 was elected by a large majority as Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico to the United States to succeed Hon. Luis Muñoz Rivera, and was reelected at each succeeding election, namely, 1920, 1924, and 1928, having served in this capacity for a period of 15 years; was nominated by the President to be associate justice of the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico, March 3, 1932. He was confirmed by the Senate March 17 and resigned as Resident Commissioner April 11, 1932.

Mr. Davila has served his island and the Nation of which it is a part well and patriotically. I am sure the membership of this House wish him happiness, prosperity, and continued usefulness in the high office to which he has been called.

MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a memorial address delivered yesterday at Arlington by ex-Senator James A. Reed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. James A. Reed at national memorial services, Arlington National Cemetery, May 30, 1932:

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES A. REED AT NATIONAL MEMORIAL SERVICES, ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY, MAY 30, 1932

Liberty was born upon the battlefields of the Revolution.

It was proclaimed in the thunders of Washington's cannon.

It was baptized in the blood of soldiers who died that we might all be free.

Seventeen hundred and seventy-six marked the beginning of the age of freedom.

Back of that stretched a night of a thousand years.

Through its darkness man groped his hopeless way, wearing the triple chains of ignorance, of superstition, and of fear.

The light of the renaissance had begun to penetrate the gloom. Here and there heroic souls had risen in revolt to fall before the sword of tyranny.

But 1776 witnessed the first great rally of a race of men who chose death rather than submit to tyranny.

Without an army or a ship of war they dared defy the mightiest empire of earth—the mistress of the seven seas.

A courage more sublime has never glorified the page of time.

Whence came this valor of battle and of sacrifice?

It was gained in the solitude of the New World by men who, in its conflicts, came to know that all men stand on equal ground.

Amidst the vastness they caught the spirit of independence and came to hate a master and to despise a slave.

Their minds penetrated the false philosophy of the past and exposed the shams of tradition, hoary with age.

They refused to answer the commands of a petty and distant individual who happened to be crowned a king.

The embers of rebellion glowing in their hearts burst into flame upon the hills of Massachusetts, the mountains of Virginia, and amidst the groves of the Southland.

At those fires the torches of liberty have been lighted, to be borne around the world.

We then declared—

All men to be free and equal.

That we would forever defend our shores against a foreign foe.

That we would keep free from entanglements with alien powers.

Pursuing these policies, we have become the mightiest of nations. Our shores are washed by the waves of two oceans. And from the homes of a hundred and twenty-five million people shine the lights of liberty at eventide.

Although a cloud may now and then obscure the sun and cast a passing shadow, our twilight is more luminous than the full day in other lands.

We are amalgamating many races. And if it be true that the dominant characteristics survive in mingled offspring, then we can, in part, account for the splendid achievements of the past and confidently anticipate a day when the American shall embrace in his character the sturdy courage of the Briton, the philosophy of the German, the artistry of France, the music of Italy, and the aspirations of all.

Dreamers may dream the dreams and poets sing the songs of an eternal peace—prophets proclaim a millennium which does not come.

Pale and anæmic pacifists denounce the soldier who stands guard upon our shores and gives protection to our homes.

But it was men with iron in their souls who gave us all the liberty we have.

They were the pioneers who led the march.

Their gallant swords struck off the shackles tyranny had forged and loosed the limbs of men.

From their supreme and holy sacrifice—from their red blood, the flowers of freedom spring.

Dreamers may dream their dreams and universal congresses write their thousand pledges of eternal amity.

These are but paper pacts quickly consumed in hatred's smoldering fires.

So long as flames of human passion burn and barbarious races arm for carnage, slaughter, and for spoils, wise men will put no faith in paper barricades.

On the stout hearts and the unyielding swords of our own gallant sons we must rely.

For those who marched with aching hearts from myriad homes; who parted from their loved ones with tear-dimmed eyes; who entered camp and field with hearts steeled against the tremors of fear; who looked death in the face and knew the price they paid; who gave their lives that this great country should maintain its dignity and place amidst the constellations of the earth, and that we should remain secure in the possession of our rights and privileges;

For all of these—and for all those who endured the fatigues of the march, the rigors of the camp, the horrors of the hospital, the agonies of sickness, and who yet survive, bearing their sufferings through the long years of life;

For these—for all of these—a grateful Nation gives its cheers, mingled with reverence and tears.

The spirit of '76 has never died.

It inspired Jackson's frontiersmen as they manned the cotton bales at New Orleans.

It led the hosts of Scott as they stormed Chapultepec's dizzy heights, and Roosevelt's men when they charged at San Juan Hill.

It hovered over Grant and Lee as they led their embattled hosts in deadly conflicts of the Civil War.

It guided the ships of Dewey through the waters of Manila Bay.

It was with Schley as he sunk the Spanish fleet off Santiago.

It thrilled the hearts of Pershing's hosts as they rolled back the tide of German valor on the fields of France.

The heroism of the past pales before that exhibited ten thousand times in the World War.

Not Horatius at the bridge; not Leonidas at Thermopylæ; not Achilles at the walls of troy; not Richard Cœur de Lion at Acre—so long the theme of song and eloquence—can be compared with the courage of those who amidst the clouds, thousands of feet above the earth, with none to witness or to give encouragement, went unflinchingly to single combat and to death.

Nor does it bear comparison with that valor which coolly followed a barrage of bursting shells through poisoned gases, which like the breath of myriad serpents, silently crept across the field, stole into trenches, and burned out the lungs and lives of men.

The foot-to-foot and shield-to-shield conflicts of Cæsar's legions can not measure up with the charge at St. Mihiel or the Battles of the Argonne, where German discipline and valor broke upon the bayonets of half-trained lads, reared in the atmosphere of freedom beneath the Stars and Stripes.

Let us keep to the old faith—let us walk the straight road which has led from infancy to proud and glorious manhood.

The spirit of '76 still lives.

So long as it shall be the guide and inspiration of our land our liberties will be secure.

And our proud flag, baptized in valorous blood and tender tears, will still proclaim to all the world the puissance of America—the freedom and dignity of men.

UNITED STATES ROANOKE COLONY COMMISSION

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Rules I call up for immediate consideration House Resolution 172, providing for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 26, a concurrent resolution to establish a commission to be known as the United States Roanoke Colony Commission to report a plan and program for the celebration in 1934 of the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of English-speaking civilization in America on Roanoke Island, N. C.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 172

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 26, to establish a commission to be known as the United States Roanoke Colony Commission.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes—to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Library—the resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

At the conclusion of the reading of the resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution, and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What charge is this commission going to make upon the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will state to the gentleman that that matter will be fully disclosed by the gentleman from North Carolina, the author of this resolution, in just a few moments.

Mr. BLANTON. Could the gentleman give us an approximate idea?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will not the gentleman wait for just a moment until he can hear from the gentleman from North Carolina? I am not as familiar with it as the author and I am sure he will give a full explanation.

Mr. BLANTON. The only reason I ask about the expense is that we have here now just a handful of Members present. If it is going to make any big charge on the Treasury, I want to get a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can assure the gentleman that it is not contemplated and will not be countenanced.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 26, to establish a commission to be known as the United States Roanoke Colony Commission to report a plan and program for the celebration in 1934 of the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of English-speaking civilization in America on Roanoke Island, N. C.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 26, with Mr. BLACK in the chair.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 26

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the United States Roanoke Colony Commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission), and to be composed of six commissioners, as follows: Three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commissioners shall serve without compensation and shall select a chairman from among their number.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the commissioners to prepare and report a plan or plans and a program for the commemoration in 1934 of the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of English-speaking civilization in America on Roanoke Island, N. C., with an estimate of the probable cost; to give due and proper consideration to such plan or plans as may be submitted to them for such celebration; to confer with such civic associations and organizations, and with such other commissions, Federal, State, and municipal, as may be appointed for purposes similar to the purpose of this resolution, and to take such steps as may be necessary to secure the coordination and correlation of plans prepared by such commissions; and to do all such other things as may be necessary to carry into full effect the intents and purposes of this resolution.

SEC. 3. That the commission, after selecting a chairman and a vice chairman from among their members, may employ a secretary and such other assistants as may be needed for clerical work connected with the duties of the commission: Provided, That said commission can so arrange that no part of the pay or expenses of such secretary and other assistants, if any, shall be paid by the United States.

SEC. 4. The commissioners shall receive no compensation for their services but shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties, and the same shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the House and Senate.

SEC. 5. That the said commission be, and the same is hereby, authorized to call upon the Commission of Fine Arts, in Washington, for their assistance and advice in connection with any plan or plans that may be submitted or considered, and the said Commission of Fine Arts is directed to render such assistance and advice as its other duties may permit and as may be within its power.

SEC. 6. That the commission shall, on or before the 15th day of December, 1932, make a report to the Congress in order that enabling legislation may be enacted.

SEC. 7. That the commission hereby created shall expire within one year after the expiration of the celebration.

SEC. 8. That this concurrent resolution shall take effect immediately.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the time under my control to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, the resolution so clearly states its purpose, I do not care to take up any of the time of the committee unless some gentleman desires additional information about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee of the amount of money that will likely be imposed upon the National Treasury if this resolution is passed?

Mr. WARREN. Under this particular resolution I can not conceive of any expenditure being made. If the commission set up by the resolution should report back next December, recommending some contribution, of course, an appropriation would be asked. I would like to say to the gentleman, and I say this voluntarily, we would only ask for a small, modest contribution on the part of the Federal Government. If this commission were to come in here next December asking for any extravagant or unnecessary sum, I should join my friend in opposing it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not the purpose then for this commission to provide for the erection of public buildings as a permanent memorial commemorating what the resolution refers to as the founding of English-speaking civilization on Roanoke Island?

Mr. WARREN. No; as the gentleman will observe, this is the oldest possible anniversary we can celebrate in America.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the landing of the English colonists at Jamestown in 1606 was the oldest.

Mr. WARREN. The settlement on Roanoke Island was in 1584. I am sure the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I am very frank to confess that I was unaware of the fact there was a settlement that antedated the landing at Jamestown in 1606. I may say in this connection that I have studied colonial history rather closely in times past, and, perhaps, the gentleman can give us some information that will confirm his statement that the landing at Jamestown was not entitled to the honor of being termed the founding of English civilization on this continent.

Mr. WARREN. The history of Roanoke Colony is one of the most thrilling events in American history. Sir Walter Raleigh sent out three colonies and they all landed at Roanoke Island, N. C. The last colony was under Gov. John White. It completely disappeared from the face of the earth. The first child of English-speaking parentage, Virginia Dare, was born there, and the first Christian baptism to be held on American soil also occurred there.

Mr. STAFFORD. One further question. Have the local authorities or the State authorities initiated any movement to commemorate this three hundred and fiftieth anniversary?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the gentleman that about seven years ago we had the British ambassador, Sir Esme Howard, come there and we had to get all the people there by boat. We carried 5,000 people to that island, which is the county seat of that county. The State of North Carolina has bridged its sounds and built a magnificent hard-surfaced highway down the beach of North Carolina, which places this spot in easy access to the Nation. Several years ago a tablet in commemoration of the first white child born in the Nation was erected by Congress at this spot.

Mr. STAFFORD. My question was whether the State or local authorities had initiated any movement commemorating this three hundred and fiftieth anniversary.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and Paul Green, a noted playwright, is now writing a play to be used for that occasion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any movement under way whereby the State is to appropriate any money or appoint a commission for this purpose?

Mr. WARREN. No appropriation, but a commission has already been appointed.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina now yield?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. TARVER. In view of the fact that this colony was only an abortive effort and all traces of it soon passed away, how can it properly be referred to, as stated in the resolution, as the birth of English-speaking civilization in America? Does the gentleman think the Congress should pass a resolution making any such statement as that with reference to this lost colony of Roanoke, which left no trace whatever upon our civilization?

Mr. WARREN. Of course I do, because they lived there several years. They had a governor and children were born there.

Mr. TARVER. No descendants of those children survive in this country.

Mr. WARREN. We have the name of every single man, woman, and child who was there in the colony and who disappeared. They all disappeared except the governor, who returned to England.

Mr. TARVER. May I ask one further question? The gentleman said this resolution would entail no expense. I call the gentleman's attention to the recitals in section 4 authorizing payment of hotel bills, traveling expenses, and other expenses without limit incurred by these so-called commissioners and ask the gentleman whether that section does not authorize a rather unlimited expense to be charged against the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WARREN. I said I could not conceive of any expense occurring under this resolution. If the resolution is adopted there will be three Members of the House and three Members of the Senate appointed.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Can the gentleman assure the House that Senator NYE will not be appointed on this commission?

Mr. WARREN. I would prefer not to answer that.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The main thing about this resolution that alarms me is the establishment of a new commission. I am with the gentleman about commemorating such events, but the thing the American people are most vitally concerned about just now is meeting the harrassing problems of the present emergency. Thousands of farmers are being turned out of their homes every day by foreclosure of mortgages against their farms.

They are pleading for some relief. I can not see the wisdom of passing such a resolution at this particular time until we grant some relief to the farmers who are losing their homes. This commission when once appointed will gather moss as it goes like a rolling snowball going down hill, and the first thing we know there will be a big expense attached to it.

Mr. WARREN. I assure the gentleman from Texas that there will not, and I invite him next December, if they come in and ask for a big appropriation, to oppose it, and he will find me joining with him.

Mr. BLANTON. As one member of the Committee on Appropriations I am going to oppose any and all new commissions to be appointed until we get on a sound financial basis. I do not intend to vote for any new commission or any new bureau until we get out of this depression.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I do not know that this will interest us, but there is one phrase in the resolution that is fundamentally unsound, and although the money to be expended under the resolution is by popular subscription, I suppose, you provide for a secretary and such other clerical assistants as may be needed connected with the duties of the commission. Under that they can go the limit and do as they have heretofore—ask that it be taken out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. This is an exact copy of the Yorktown resolution. I assure the gentleman that I do not think there will be any expense under this resolution.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the proviso under section 3, which says:

> The said commission can so arrange that no part of the pay or expenses of such secretary and other assistants, if any, shall be paid by the United States.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I know; it says, "can" so arrange. It does not say "shall."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, Is it not a fact that the fort constructed by Sir Walter Raleigh still stands at this spot?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I was going to state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the outline of Raleigh's original fort constructed there in 1584 is still plainly visible.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am rather surprised that we are to celebrate the birth on Roanoke Island of English-speaking civilization in America, which apparently was abortive and got nowhere, instead of at Jamestown.

Mr. WARREN. This made Jamestown possible.

Mr. PARKS. Is there any limitation in the resolution as to the amount of expense?

Mr. WARREN. This resolution simply authorizes the appointment of a commission consisting of three Members of each House to report back here in December as to whether or not there shall be any participation in the celebration.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman said that this made Jamestown possible. Will the gentleman elaborate that a little?

Mr. WARREN. I think the efforts of Raleigh invited others. I think we are all agreed on that. They were all attempting to find some lodgment along the North Carolina and Virginia coast.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no other time desired, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

Under the rule the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Concurrent Resolution 26, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. GILBERT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HESS, for the balance of the week, on account of official business.

GOVERNMENT COMPETITION WITH PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 235, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 235

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a special committee to be composed of five members for the purpose of investigating Government competition with private enterprise and all other questions in relation thereto that would aid the Congress in any necessary remedial legislation. The committee shall report to the House not later than December 15, 1932, the result of its investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

That said special committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, by subpœna or otherwise, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary, and such expenses thereof shall be paid on vouchers ordered by said committee and approved by the chairman thereof. Subpœnas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman and shall be served by any person designated by him. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] wish?

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have had no requests for time, but ask the gentleman to yield me the usual amount in case he is going to use some himself.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this resolution speaks for itself. There has been throughout the country widespread complaint concerning the activities and practices of the Government in competing with private enterprise. A most surprising exhibit was made to the Committee on Rules. It was shown by our colleague, Mr. SHANNON, that the Government is now engaged in varied enterprises in competition with legitimate business. He had an exhibit there very surprising to me showing that anyone could go into Federal Government stores and not only buy what was necessary for the Army and the Navy but numerous articles which could not possibly be necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The Congress has known for years that officers of the Army and Navy are allowed to buy everything they want at these Government supply stores and that these Army and Navy stores are run at a tremendous loss to the Government all the time. They can buy anything on earth down there. They even buy their fuel for their homes. We all know these things. After we appoint this commission and it spends a lot of money to get the facts we now know, if any move is ever made to stop it, the gentleman will find the Army and Navy Club here and the Navy League and the big Army and Navy Members of the House endeavoring to stop any move to do away with these stores. It occurs to me that if we went to work here and passed a resolution to abolish these stores and stopped this rather than spend the money and this waste of time in appointing a useless commission, we would serve the country better.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the very point is that the country does not know about this. If the country at large knew what is taking place, I think the country would rise up in protest and stop it. There is a legitimate line of demarcation beyond which the Government ought not to trespass. The purpose of this resolution is to appoint this committee in order to ascertain, if possible, what the legitimate activities of the Government ought to be and what activities are not legitimate.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I would rather not yield. I would rather the gentleman question the author of the bill. It seems to me that this resolution ought to pass.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me two or three minutes?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to add anything to what has already been so well said by the chairman of the Committee on Rules. However, in order to show that this is a matter of great importance, and that it has impressed itself upon the most responsible and representative business organization of the country, for the purpose of the RECORD I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read a copy of the letter which I send to the desk, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, together with the resolution passed by the United States Chamber of Commerce upon this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLACK). Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MAY 28, 1932.

Hon. EDWARD W. POU,
Chairman Committee on Rules,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The action taken by your committee in reporting favorably House Resolution 235 is very gratifying to the membership of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. It is our hope that the House will act promptly and that the committee which is to inquire into all phases of Government competition will soon be in a position to proceed with its task.

Our organization made its latest expression relating to Government competition on May 20. I attach a copy.

Very truly yours,

——— ———, President.

Resolution adopted at the twentieth annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, San Francisco, Calif., May 20, 1932

GOVERNMENT COMPETITION

The earnest position of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States against the Government engaging in any form of business enterprise in competition with its citizens has been repeatedly expressed. Since the last annual meeting the membership has been enlisted in a survey of the forms and extent of Government competition. Much information has thus been brought together and placed at the disposal of the special committee which was appointed by the board of directors to study the subject in all of its phases. This committee has submitted a progress report and will shortly present its considered recommendations.

This report will be very timely because of the pressing need for economy in Government spending and in view of the increasing burdens of taxation. While the committee in its progress report found it impossible to determine exactly the cost of business activities of the Federal Government, it is certain that reported losses and deficits are extensive. Large sums are now spent by the Federal Government upon business and commercial ventures of its own. In addition to direct losses, there are at once detriments to private citizens engaged in lawful pursuits, and important losses to the Government by reason of its deprivation of revenues which would be derived from these enterprises if conducted by citizens and taxpayers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I think the Clerk did not read the name signed to the letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no signature to the letter.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Rules I received a copy of this letter which was signed by the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON].

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible to comprehensively present, in 15 minutes, the subject of governmental competition with private enterprise. The purpose of requesting the appointment of a special committee is to give to those citizens throughout the United States who have been and are oppressed by Government in business an opportunity to be heard. This is an accumulation of many, many years. Government, through its agencies, may reach out and take from the small man in trade his means of livelihood. Unless a special committee is appointed under this resolution to give a hearing to the restaurant man, to the laundryman, to the livestock man, to the coal man, and to the thousands of others who have been oppressed by these governmental activities, I see little hope for anything being done to ameliorate the situation.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Is it proposed to make a part of this investigation the express and freight business carried on under the guise of the parcel post, also the maternity care, which is in competition with the doctors of the Nation?

Mr. SHANNON. If the gentleman will give me a reasonable length of time to discuss the matter, I think I can answer his questions fully. The committee gave three days to the hearings on the resolution. When we first went before the Committee on Rules there was some little opposition, but at the conclusion of our last hearing every member of that committee voted for this resolution. So you can see the importance of it. I think it is a very broad resolution. In fact, it is a better resolution than the one I originally introduced, because my resolution was based primarily on Government activities in Kansas City alone, where a restaurant is being operated in the Federal reserve building, where it is contemplated to install a restaurant in the new post office building, and where space is being rented in a Government building in competition with local realty owners.

The thing that is pleasant about this is its nonpartisan nature. I attended a meeting at the Kansas City Stockyards a few weeks ago. A gentleman stepped up to me and said, "I am chairman of this meeting, and I am here so as to take politics out of it. You know that I did not vote for you, and I may not vote for you the next time, but I want the world to know that we stand as one in trying to protect our business from governmental invasions."

Members of the Chamber of Commerce of Leavenworth, Kans., called on me. They said, "There is a terrible condition existing in our little community. Our merchants are being destroyed every day by the so-called post stores. They can not compete with them."

Post stores are relics of the old sutler system, when the Army was out on the plains or in the mountains or the fields of battle, far removed from civic centers, and sutler stores were established to furnish accommodations for those in the service. Fort Leavenworth is within a few blocks of the town of Leavenworth and a few miles from Kansas City, St. Joseph, and Atchison.

One of the citizens of Leavenworth wrote me to come to his aid. He said:

> I have a little jewelry store, which is my sole support. A civil-service employee comes in and asks if I have a Seth Thomas clock. I show him one. He takes the number, then walks across the street to the Government post and buys the same clock for less than I can sell it to him. If the post does not have it in stock, it is ordered.

He says that this makes bolshevists. Then, fine, good man that he is, he concludes his letter with this line:

> Oh, let God give Congress the strength to investigate this question and forever stop it.

These merchants at Leavenworth do not want something temporary.

You can not buy a paper of pins up there to-day as a result of the introduction of this resolution; but 10 days ago you could have bought a paper of pins, or you could have bought a furnace for the house, or you could have bought a piano—anything under the sun. At Leavenworth they say, "We want this thing settled once and forever."

This resolution provides that the special committee shall report back to the next session of Congress. No standing committee can do this work well, because it does not have the time.

I said to the committee from Leavenworth, "Tell me something; what will they sell you at Leavenworth?" They said, "Anything." So my clerk went up there, and the first thing she was told to get was cigarettes. She bought two packages of cigarettes at the post. She paid 15 cents for these and came right out and bought two of the same brand from a Leavenworth merchant and had to pay 17 cents. She had to pay the State tax in the State of Kansas but did not have to pay it at the fort. These are not supplies merely for the members of the Army. They are goods which are sold to anybody, no matter where they are from.

The next thing she bought was this bottle of cologne. The next was a handkerchief. Next she bought this—I never yet have found out what they wanted to sell this at the fort for unless it was to deceive the enemy in case it came there. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I yield.

Mr. PARKS. I just wanted to ask the gentleman where he got that garment and what it is?

Mr. SHANNON. I got it at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., at the fort.

Mr. KELLER. It is a pajama suit, is it not?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes; feminine.

It is contemplated at this moment to put restaurants in 32 new post-office buildings.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORR] has a story with reference to the laundrymen at Bremerton, Wash., far from my district.

I thought I would go out on a little shopping trip of my own here in Washington, so I went down to different places in the city, and after visiting them I sent a young man out, and when he came back he brought this suit of clothes, purchased at a Government institution at Bolling Field. He bought this shirt at a Government institution at 1800 C Street. Then, in addition to that, he bought this belt, and he bought this necktie also at 1800 C Street. Then he topped off the morning's work by buying a pair of shoes at Bolling Field. These shoes were made in England, as you will see stamped on the sole.

Mr. COX. What was the cost of them?

Mr. SHANNON. I am not sure. I think it was $4.85. I want you to see the box. It reads, "Pride of England's Shoe Craft." Just at that time I received a letter from a great shoe factory in St. Louis. The manager wrote:

> Can not something be done to stop the Government from making shoes at Leavenworth and competing with us in the Indian reservations?

I went up to Eighteenth and C Streets and I bought canned chicken and crab meat. I bought stockings and soap, and I bought collars, and I bought Listerine. Then I bought these four bottles. They read like this: "Rum. Contents of bottle sufficient to flavor 1 gallon." I do not know whether it is rain water or tea, but the assumption is that this imparts the flavor of rum to homemade liquor. An accommodating clerk there told me, "We have a great demand for this. Everybody is buying it."

Mr. COX. Read the names on the rest of these.

Mr. SHANNON. Gin, rum, rye——

Mr. MILLER. Where is this place?

Mr. SHANNON. Eighteenth and C Streets.

It is impossible to cover this subject in 15 minutes. It would really make an hour's interesting discussion. I hope the committee will be composed of men who will treat the subject seriously and give a patient hearing to those who are being oppressed.

Just think of it! The musicians protest against Army bands being sent out on money-making trips. Then we have factories of all kinds joining the chorus of complaints. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STOKES] came to me and said: "We have in the city of Scranton a varnish factory, and they appeal to us to close the competing Government factory at Norfolk, Va., because it is ruining them."

We have protests from 20 different cities at this time on Government competition with private laundries, but the experience in the city of Washington will be sufficient for all. Fort Myer sends Government wagons over to gather up the Army officers' clothes, and incidentally the clothes of all their neighbors and friends, and later they whisper, "We get our work done 30 per cent cheaper." The laundrymen of Washington say: "Of course, you do. We have to pay rent; we have to pay labor; we have to equip our plants and pay for everything that is necessary for our privately conducted business."

In Leavenworth the merchants say, "If all of this is done for the personnel of the Army, then you ought to consider us. The Government pays those men good wages, and then after they have served a certain length of time they are retired on two-thirds pay; but we still have to fight for a living."

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand from the gentleman's position on this resolution he is opposed to the Government being in business and competing with private industry?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Then why did the gentleman vote for Muscle Shoals?

Mr. SHANNON. I voted for Muscle Shoals, I may say to the gentleman from New York, for the reason the question involved the rights of many concerning the use of that great property and the later use of the power. There may be something in what the gentleman says.

Mr. SNELL. I would think there was something in what I say, because it puts a tax burden on the American people of from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000 to put the Government in business, yet the gentleman complains because the Government washes a few clothes for somebody in competition with a private laundry.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit a suggestion?

Mr. SHANNON. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I have no desire to draw the gentleman from the question propounded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], but when the gentleman appeared before the Rules Committee he had a very important piece of evidence in the nature of advertising matter calling the public's attention to sales' days when they were putting on special bargains.

Mr. SNELL. Before the gentleman gets too far afield he better answer my question.

Mr. COX. I think he answered it quite satisfactorily.

Mr. RICH. There may be such a thing as voting for one particular thing and then getting off the track. I think the gentleman is on the right track now and I hope he will press this resolution to a conclusion, because we have too much Government in business. I think the quicker we help get it out of business the better. If we can muster enough votes to help the gentleman, we will do something really worth while.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will offer a resolution to stop this we will vote for it.

Mr. SHANNON. That has been done.

Mr. Cox a moment ago referred to a piece of advertising sent out under the heading, "The Command and General Staff School, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., Information Bulletin No. 136, February 12, 1932." Among the articles advertised are the following:

Women's exchange: Framed oil paintings (desert scenes); one 6 inches by 7½ inches at $2; one 8 inches by 11 inches at $4. Work is well done and colorful. Come in and see the hand-made children's clothes, priced $1 and up. Beautifully made.

Post exchange specials for Friday and Saturday. Sale starts Friday noon. Grocery department: Fresh country eggs, dozen 15 cents; pure creamery butter, 24 cents; red pitted cherries, gallon 47 cents; Campfire marshmallows, 1-pound package 16 cents; Heinz catsup, 3 bottles 57 cents; Heinz plum and fig pudding, 1-pound tins 2 for 55 cents; Hawaiian pineapple, No. 2½ cans 15 cents; Pickwick cocoa, 2 pounds 25 cents; grapefruit, large size, each 6 cents, dozen 66 cents, half crate (27 grapefruit), $1.46; cooking and eating apples (Winesap), per bushel 89 cents; Roman beauty apples, bushel $1.46; lemons, dozen 19 cents; mushrooms, 26 cents; cooking apples, 7 pounds 25 cents; whipping cream, one-half pint 15 cents; head lettuce, 5 cents; leaf lettuce, 10 cents; dwarf celery, 11 cents; large celery, 12 cents; carrots, 2 bunches 15 cents; beets, 2 bunches 15 cents; turnips, 9 cents; radishes, 3 bunches 10 cents; green onions, 3 bunches 10 cents; spinach, 3 pounds 25 cents; tomatoes, 2 pounds 25 cents; cauliflower, 15 cents; sweetpotatoes, 10 pounds 32 cents; new potatoes, 6 pounds 25 cents; potatoes, 10 pounds 18 cents; peas, 17 cents; green beans, 10 cents; green peppers, 3 pounds 10 cents; Brussels sprouts, 15 cents; broccoli, 15 cents; avocados, 25 cents; bananas, dozen 15 cents; eating apples, 35 cents.

And so forth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, those engaged in the insurance business make complaint. They say they can not compete with Government insurance rates.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five minutes of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Missouri six minutes.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, let me read from a radio address made by Merle Thorpe, editor of the Nation's Business, on March 3, 1932:

I have before me a list of eighty-odd undertakings in which the Federal Government is competing with private industry, which, of course, must furnish, through taxes, part of the money to make this competition possible.

That is the contention of the man in trade, that he has to face the Government in business, and in facing it he faces a competitor who has a special sales place, has no taxes to pay, and really no overhead to pay. This question was considered by the chamber of commerce in San Francisco. They passed a resolution on the subject. At the same moment in the city of Louisville the retail coal dealers got together and entered a protest against Government buildings being used as places for the sale of coal. Then came a letter from Oklahoma in which it was stated that an agency of the Government had taken over coal mines and had ruined the local coal industry.

I hope you will bear with me just a little longer. Here is a protest from the retail grocers of Seattle, Wash.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Will the gentleman give us some idea about what this investigation will cost?

Mr. SHANNON. I do not know; but any reasonable sum would be well spent.

Mr. DE PRIEST. I think the gentleman has a good resolution.

Mr. SHANNON. I have no idea what it will cost. Not having had much experience with these things, I do not know, but any reasonable amount, $15,000 or $20,000, would be well spent, so that this Congress would know at its next session how to handle this question.

I want to read a resolution adopted by the Washington Retail Grocers, an association in Seattle. They are protesting against the destruction of their business.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Has the gentleman had any protest from the private printing industry of the country as to the Government engaging in printing work?

Mr. SHANNON. I have received many complaints, any number of them.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman called attention to the fact that these shoes were made in England. I want to call his attention to the fact that this hat was also made in England.

Mr. SHANNON. I did not know that.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Does the gentleman know how much gasoline is sold in this way for private consumption?

Mr. SHANNON. Many such complaints have come from all over the country. The quantity runs into thousands and thousands of gallons every day.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Has the gentleman the figures, or will be put in the RECORD an estimate, showing the amount of tax which the States lose in that way?

Mr. SHANNON. I have no idea.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. That information is available.

Mr. SHANNON. Perhaps it is. However, the only way you can get at it is by having this investigation made. You can then procure all of this information and be prepared to pass adequate remedial legislation.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman, of course, can not in the short time he has touch upon this great subject. The gentleman has not spoken about the beef industry, and he has not referred to the groceries which are sold in all of the Army posts to Army officers, and probably to all of their relatives.

Mr. SHANNON. If you will pass this resolution you will be able to get at all of those facts.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I have many complaints from manufacturers in my district who are complaining about divisions of the Army which are engaged in competition with private business. They are taking business away from private enterprise when it should go to private enterprise instead of being handled by the Government. I will be glad to see the gentleman have this resolution put through.

Mr. SHANNON. I thank the gentleman. Let me touch another phase of this. I have here protests from coal men who object to post offices being used as organizing points at which to sell goods. I went over and looked at this great restaurant in the Commerce Building and I found it has a seating capacity of 2,500. I asked the purpose of it and was told that it makes for efficiency. The clerks, I was told, have only half an hour for their lunch. I said, "That may be all right, but why do you serve breakfast in this room?" They said they did not know the purpose of it. I said, "Would it not be as well to have these clerks eat at home, whether they live in Virginia, Maryland, or in the District of Columbia, and thus help the local grocer, or else patronize the local restaurants?" Then I went into the Revenue Building, and I found the same thing.

A Washington merchant timidly handed me this letter. I will not take the time to read more than an excerpt therefrom. The Manufacturers' Association wrote to the Interstate Commerce Commission and complained about that department being used for commercial purposes, and then this was the reply.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute. I would yield the gentleman five minutes if the gentleman from Indiana would let me have it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] is in control of the remaining time.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have some requests for time, and so far as I am concerned, I think the gentleman has made out his case. However, I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. SHANNON. The reply of the bureau clerk was this:

> In reply, would advise you there is in existence an organization known as the Incomco Club. The idea of this organization is to greatly improve the morale among the employees.

And then at the end he gives this excuse:

> Time so spent, however, in the use of Government clerks is entirely in the interests of the morale of the commission.

This is the kind of stuff that the merchants have to face, and I hope this Congress will handle it in a way that all over the Nation those engaged in trade will be furnished relief.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is the gentleman's resolution broad enough so that we can also get after the Farm Board to find out whether they are indirectly competing with business?

Mr. SHANNON. It is a very broad resolution and I would think it covered that.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman exhibited a pair of shoes that show on the inside, as well as the outside, that they were made in England. Is that shoe sold by them at a less price than the American shoe?

Mr. SHANNON. Four dollars and eighty-five cents, I think, is the price.

Mr. KELLER. Is that cheaper than an American shoe would be?

Mr. SHANNON. I do not know.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to take up any time personally. I have some requests for time, and I merely want to say that this resolution comes from the Committee on Rules with the unanimous support of that committee; and speaking for myself personally, I am in hearty sympathy with the purposes of the resolution. However, I should like very much to have had the resolution provide some curb on expenditures in order that the committee might not go too far afield and tax the Treasury too much.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Does the gentleman from Indiana think this resolution is sufficiently broad to go into a great many activities throughout the country where the Government is competing with private business?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; from Muscle Shoals down.

Mr. BACON. As the gentleman well knows, the Navy maintains a factory for the manufacture of clothing, whereas in former times they used to call for bids on a competitive basis, and the Government to-day is spending a good deal more for its clothing than it paid in the past when the Navy bought its clothing following competitive bids from private manufacturers.

Mr. PURNELL. I may say to the gentleman that some years ago I made an attempt to break up that practice, but I did not get anywhere with it.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, so far as the subject matter of this resolution is concerned, I am not in opposition to it; but considering the source from which it comes, I think there must be something hidden in the resolution itself that ought to be investigated.

What has happened in the last few weeks that has so changed the Democratic majority in its attitude toward putting the Government in business? When we had the Muscle Shoals proposition before us, which provided for putting the Government into business in the manufacture of fertilizer in competition with private industry, and also providing from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000 in putting the Government into this new business in competition with private industries, I find that five of the eight members of the Democratic Rules Committee voted in favor of it, one voted against it, one voted present, and one member was absent.

I find that the gentleman who is so much disturbed here to-day about the Government being in business also voted to put the Government in business at Muscle Shoals. I am wondering just what has happened and why the Members on that side are so much disturbed about the Government doing a little laundering or running a little grocery business at the various posts in the country.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If my memory serves me correctly, the gentleman from New York now speaking on the other side of the aisle voted to put the Government in wheat and cotton business. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Certainly not; we voted to help out our farmers; that is all. We did not put the Government in business.

The gentleman from New York has been consistent all the way through in keeping the Government out of business, and you can follow his record here for 18 years and you will find that he has consistently voted against it.

Now, I am wondering what has happened on the other side. I am wondering what the gentleman from Kansas City has to say about the barge line on the Mississippi, and whether he wants that done away with because it competes with private business.

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. PARKS. I am sure the gentleman would not make a statement that is misleading——

Mr. SNELL. No; and if I have, I will apologize.

Mr. PARKS. The gentleman knows that there is not a barge line on any river of the United States that is in competition with private business. For instance, the Government has refused to go into the barge-line business on the Ohio River because we have a private barge line there; and just as soon as any private enterprise is willing to take over the barge line on the Mississippi River, under the bill we have passed, the Government has said that we are willing to turn it over to them.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman knows very well that no private corporation will ever take it over from the Government, and we will always be in business there.

Mr. PARKS. Does the gentleman wish to deny to the people the privilege of having barge lines?

Mr. SNELL. No; I simply want to know the attitude of you gentlemen as to certain propositions in your own home towns. If it is in competition with your own people, you are against it.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman think that the Republicans could join with the Democrats in keeping the Government out of business?

Mr. SNELL. I will join them if they will join with us in keeping it all out.

Mr. HARLAN. Is it contemplated that an amendment will be offered to the bill limiting expenses?

Mr. SNELL. You have got the most far-reaching resolution that has been offered in the House for a great many years. If they do all that they have a right to do under this resolution, they could investigate everything from Alaska to Miami at a cost of half a billion dollars before they get through. I am in sympathy with the attempt, but I call attention to this remarkable situation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from New York will distinguish between a public necessity where the use is universal, where the public has no opportunity of receiving the benefits of competition, like public service, electric light, and so forth——

Mr. SNELL. Oh, that does not apply here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The difference between that and a little peanut-stand proposition like this. There is a great distinction.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am very much in favor of the resolution, if it goes to a certain extent. I do not see any reason why the Government should go into the business of selling such things as these—bottles, shoes, shirts, hats, pajamas, and so forth—in competition with the small merchant. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] has covered this competition with the small merchants and little stores and I am not going to say anything further on that score.

He has brought in, however, the question of paint at the Norfolk Navy Yard. That is an entirely different question. We have to repair these ships and paint the bottoms, and we employ civilians to make and put the paint on. It is economy for the Government; it employs just as many men, and it is only used in Government navy yards. That is entirely different from the operation of stores in competition with merchants.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the gentleman will be able to stop competition with private shipyards in building Government vessels by the Government.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I expected the gentleman might ask that question, but I can not agree with him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think that this resolution would authorize them to go to Ohio and investigate the printing by the Government of cards and stamped envelopes in competition with private business?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. This committee is going to have a big job, and it might do that.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Does the gentleman think the Rules Committee is fair to this House in reporting a resolution that gives carte blanche authority to this committee to draw on the Treasury of the United States for expenses of all kinds without any limit?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I think we should have had notice of this. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has spoken of a number of things into which this committee could go. The first I heard of it was this morning, and I do not really know enough about it to discuss it, though I do know that the sale of these things has been brought to my attention.

Mr. GARBER. Should there not be some limit on the expenses to be incurred?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I think there should.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER] will probably understand that before this committee is going to spend any money it must get an appropriation from the Committee on Accounts. I am absolutely in favor of the resolution, but the Committee on Accounts is not going to give the special committee any $40,000 or $50,000 as some seem to be alarmed about? I think they will get a reasonable amount. I am a member of the Committee on Accounts, and I am sure that committee will not waste the public money. It never has.

Mr. GARBER. Should we not take into consideration, in passing this resolution, the amount of expenses the committee will incur?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I doubt if we could determine how much would be necessary at this moment.

Mr. COX. Let me say for the benefit of the gentleman from Oklahoma, when the hearing on the application for this rule was had before the Committee on Rules it was not contemplated that any considerable expenditure of money would be made necessary. The nature of the investigation is such that the resolution had to be broad. It is not for the purpose of making it possible for the committee to incur large expenditures, but for giving the committee power to direct the investigation to matters about which the committee was not informed.

Mr. GARBER. Right in that connection, the power to investigate extends to the power to encourage expenses, and why should not the matter, in respect to the investigation, be given to the House, so far as the amount of expense is concerned?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] or the Committee on Rules will present a resolution to stop the sale of these goods by the Government in Army commissaries and Navy stores I shall vote to stop it without hesitation, but I can not support a resolution of this kind that will only waste money and do a futile thing. If they get any information, they will not have any more than we already have. We know that this is being done. What is the use of spending money to ascertain what we know already? This committee, or any member of it as a subcommittee, can travel all over the United States from Maine to Seattle and Florida and you will have to pay the bill. I am not in favor of it. You have to pay the expenses of it. You are authorizing them to incur expenses here, and you are going to have to appropriate the money to pay for it. I am not in favor of it. It is doing a foolish thing. Why do they not bring in a resolution and stop this now? We know that these commissaries and naval stores are selling these things all of the time and that they have been doing it.

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. When you bring the resolution in here after you have spent this money to get the information that we already have, and the purpose of the resolution is to stop the sale of these things, you will find our good friend from Oregon, General MARTIN, representing his big Regular Army, and General CHIPERFIELD coming in here, and they will obstruct every effort you make to pass it. The great Army and Navy Club, the great Navy League, will come in here and exert their influence, and they will have this gallery full of their satellites. They will stop you with their propaganda and their lobbying. I want to begin my fight right. Let us bring in a proper resolution here right now and stop it; let us pass such a resolution into law before the Congress adjourns and not send good money after bad.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman be interested in preparing or introducing such a resolution, or may I inquire whether the gentleman has sufficient information on which to draw such a resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly I have, and all of us have, but how far would it get?

Mr. COX. This resolution has gotten this far. Probably the gentleman could get his before the House.

Mr. BLANTON. If such a resolution were brought in, the gentleman knows what would happen to it. This same lobby that stopped the consolidation of the Army and the Navy Departments, which would have saved $100,000,000 here in expenses to the people, would come in here and stop it. You would find my friend from South Dakota over there [Mr. WILLIAMSON], who at first was for consolidation, jumping in here; and when you would have a teller vote he would vote against it through the tellers just as he did; and then when you had a roll call he would vote for it. You would find that happening here again. It is that infernal Army and Navy influence here. It is that insidious lobby here by the Army and the Navy generals and admirals that stops good legislation like this from passing. Why does not this committee bring in a resolution that will accomplish the thing they have in mind? What better argument would you want than this bunch of stuff here that our friend from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] has shown before us to pass a resolution of that kind? He has convinced me that it ought to stop, and he has convinced you that it ought to stop. Why do you not change this and pass a 10-line resolution here and say that they shall stop it? Then I will be with you. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] would authorize me to offer an amendment of that kind, I would offer it. Under the rules, I can not offer an amendment unless the chairman of the Rules Committee yields to me for that purpose. He has yielded to me only for the purpose of speaking against the resolution. If I were to attempt to offer an amendment, he would stop me immediately and move the previous question, which stops all amendments and all discussion. No Member here can offer an amendment, because he will not yield for that purpose. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] can put this matter to a vote at any moment he chooses by moving the previous question.

If he would give me authority to do so, I would offer an amendment with some teeth in it that would stop these Army and Navy stores and abolish them, and you would not have to spend money to investigate them.

Mr. POU. Nobody knows better than the gentleman from Texas that the Rules Committee is not a legislative committee and has no jurisdiction to report out such a resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. But if the gentleman would authorize me to offer an amendment, I do not think a point of order would be made against it, and I would offer an amendment of about 10 lines that would stop it and stop it now, and we would not be required to spend all of this money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this resolution. I think there should be a thorough investigation. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] sought to give the House the impression that this committee could spend all the money it desired. The gentleman is too well informed upon the rules of this House not to know that before this committee can function it must get an appropriation from the Committee on Accounts, and when the committee is named, that committee will appear before the Committee on Accounts and make a request for an appropriation. I can say to the gentleman from Texas, and I think the gentleman well knows, that the Committee on Accounts is not quite as liberal in giving money to special committees as some other committees in another body. Mr. SHANNON's information just presented only scratches the surface. A few days ago I added to the Army appropriation bill an amendment which prohibited the manufacture of clothes for enlisted men in a clothing shop operated by the Army in Philadelphia. I have had a hundred people on my back since that amendment was carried in that bill, despite the fact that the Army figures showed that on a garment which cost $3 or less to make, the private contractor was willing to make it for 91 cents less than the Government could make it for.

As I say, what you have heard to-day simply scratches the surface. This committee will bring real information back to the House and the House will in the end take the Government out of business. They will go up to that line of demarcation which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has pointed out, and say what should be stopped and what should not be stopped. The Government has no right to compete with the taxpayers who sustain the Government.

I hope the resolution will be adopted and a report made by the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLACK). The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been ordered. The previous question having been ordered, no amendment is in order at this time.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, let me make inquiry. I understand that all debate is cut off on the resolution, but a Member has the privilege of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules of the House, not only is debate cut off but all power to offer amendments is cut off by the ordering of the previous question.

Mr. FRENCH. The Speaker is quite right. I have confused the motion for the previous question with the common motion to close debate. I desired to offer an amendment which would limit the expenditure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman might have opposed the previous question.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARKS. The gentleman from Idaho suggests an amendment that is out of order, but would it not be in order to move to recommit the resolution with an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to recommit a special rule from the Committee on Rules is not in order.

The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 65, noes 32.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is not a quorum present, and I make the point that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 177, nays 128, not voting 126, as follows:

The motion was agreed to.

EXEMPTING FROM THE QUOTA FATHERS AND MOTHERS OVER 60 YEARS OF AGE OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution (H. Res. 211) for the consideration of H. R. 8174, a bill to exempt from the quota fathers and mothers over 60 years of age of United States citizens.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] calls up House Resolution 211, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8174, "A bill to exempt from the quota fathers and mothers over 60 years of age of United States citizens."

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman from Indiana indicate how much time he desires?

Mr. PURNELL. I will ask the gentleman from New York to give me the usual time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Indiana 30 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this is a report of the Rules Committee, which, as I recall, was unanimous, making in order the consideration of H. R. 8174, an amendment to the immigration act which would exempt from the quota provisions of that act fathers and mothers over 60 years of age of United States citizens.

It was represented to the Rules Committee that there were only some 200 of these parents of United States citizens. Of course, they would have to qualify under the other provisions of our immigration law as to their health and character, and they would also have to show that they would not become public charges; that if they did not have their own means of support there was some one in this country who could adequately take care of them; and they also must not compete with American labor.

The Rules Committee was convinced that under the circumstances, with the small number of persons involved and the precautions thrown around the entrance of these few people, and the fact they were the aged parents of American citizens, their entry was justified, and the Rules Committee recommended the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides for the consideration of H. R. 8174, a bill to exempt from the immigration quotas the fathers and mothers, over 60 years of age, of citizens of the United States. That is to say, this bill if enacted into law would admit outside of the quota restrictions the aged fathers and mothers of American citizens provided they were over 60 years of age. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], a member of the Immigration Committee, will offer an amendment which will strike out all after the enacting clause and which provides that the fathers and mothers shall be admitted within the quota without any age limit whatever. His amendment will provide also that from the few countries where there are not sufficient quotas to take care of the fathers and mothers one year shall be allowed for the coming of all such as excess quota. In his opinion, and that of a number of others on the committee, the amendment will clean up this matter, which has been pending for a long time. It will not disturb the quota system. It is more generous to the fathers and mothers, we think, than the bill of the chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN]. It stops the endless chain; it keeps restriction of immigration within the bounds set by the 1924 act, and provides a way for the fathers and mothers to come as excess quota from a few southeast European countries where there is an excess of these relatives.

If this amendment which will be offered under the 5-minute rule is adopted, I propose to offer still another amendment which I hope the chairman of the committee will accept. I have not had time to show it to him.

The second amendment I want to offer is for the reason, in my opinion, a considerable amount of the charge of distress and failure to let the close relatives come here within quotas is caused not by absence of places in the quotas, because the quotas are not exceeded except in the case of five countries, but is caused by the strict enforcement of the clause of the immigration act of 1917 which prohibits aliens from coming here who might become public charges. This section began to be applied rigidly some two and a half years ago on account of unemployment conditions in the country, increase of bread lines, and the like, and is properly enforced as to proposed new stock in immigrants who are without funds and who, if admitted, would add to the distress and unemployment here. But I am inclined to think that the consuls of the State Department have been a little too rigid in applying the public-charge clause against certain of these immediate relatives; that is, fathers and mothers, husbands or wives, and minor children under 18.

So if we can save the general-quota structure of the 1924 act by providing for admission of fathers and mothers within the legal quotas, and with one year's time, which would take care of those from Bessarabia, Turkey, Syria, and Armenia, we will clean the slate and will not be disturbed by the recurrence of the present situation. We have a more generous proposal, in my opinion, than the bill offered by the committee.

The amendment I want to offer after the Jenkins's amendment has been adopted will be as a new paragraph, to the effect that the Secretary of State shall instruct the various consular officers of the United States that in determining applications for admission as immigrants of an alien wife, husband, minor children, or parents, consideration shall be given to the moral and legal obligations in such relationships and to the natural inclination of such applicants to take steps to prevent such immediate relatives from becoming public charges.

In my opinion an amendment of that kind would be in the nature of a suggestion to the State Department that it might, as far as reasonably possible, relax the rules with regard to the danger of becoming a public charge, in so far as they could do so, in the case of fathers and mothers of citizens, minor children of the same, and wives of husbands. Of course, it is not intended to invite those who will become public charges within a short time. But the main proposal is an amendment which will keep this all within the quotas. This will be generous, liberal, and humane, and the proponent of it, Mr. JENKINS, should have some time in which to discuss it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. I notice the rule provides for one hour of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the minority and one-half by the chairman of the committee. I want to find out whether those on the majority side who are opposed to the bill will be given any time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. While the rule itself provides that the time be equally divided between the chairman and ranking minority member, it has always been the practice that both sides will yield to the proponents and to the opposition. I am sure that from one side or the other the gentleman from Florida, if he is opposed to the bill, can get some time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair believes that the rule speaks for itself in that particular.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in connection with the suggestions made by the gentleman from Washington. We understood when this matter was before the Rules Committee that it was a report from the Immigration Committee, with only one dissenting vote. I do not recall that any suggestions were then made before the Rules Committee that any change would be suggested in this bill. I have no knowledge of the relative merits of the two propositions, but I do want to call attention to the method of procedure. Last week we had a similar example, when something unusual happened with the copyright bill. When a bill comes before the Rules Committee, and the Rules Committee is not informed that substitutes or radical amendments are to be offered, I submit it is unfair to that committee. The bill that was considered by the Rules Committee should be the bill which is taken up in the House, unless something very exceptional has occurred between the hearing before the Rules Committee and the consideration of the bill in the House. Therefore, I think the amendments which have been suggested should be explained as coming within this category.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that I try to keep informed about the doings of the various committees, particularly the Rules Committee. It may have been my own fault, but, unfortunately, I was not aware of the hearing before the Rules Committee on this particular bill. No information or notice reached me. I was anxious to appear before that committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is there a minority report?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Signed by one Member, I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But he represented numerous other Members. I would like to say to the gentleman that I am sincerely hoping that we can pass this bill without an immigration struggle. I firmly believe the plan offered by the Jenkins amendment, which will be explained later in detail, is more humane, more certain to be effective, and will be more popular because of the elimination of the age limit entirely, than the chairman's own bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have no knowledge as to whether it is a better plan or not. I just wanted to call the attention of the House to the danger of considering legislation in this manner, of bringing in one bill under a special rule, after the Rules Committee has considered the effect of that bill, and then when it gets to the House to have members of the committee propose an entirely new substitute. The substitute may be preferable, as I say, but I have no knowledge of that, and do not believe such a procedure should be tolerated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would have been delighted to appear before the committee, and I have filed requests with the committee to appear on other immigration bills. The gentleman knows that this particular matter was on the calendar in past Congresses. I hope there is no feeling that one wants his plan or that another wants his plan. I am as anxious to take care of these fathers and mothers as anybody, but under an orderly plan.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is no feeling in the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I tried to speak with the gentleman before the meeting to-day, but he was busy, and, as the gentleman knows, these things often come up suddenly as a session draws to a close.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] for making the statement he has made. This resolution makes in order a very humane amendment to the immigration law. All this amendment does is to permit the fathers and mothers of American citizens, who are over 60 years of age—some of whom are parents of those who served during the late World War—to come into this country outside of the quota. The number will be very small, and I can not see how any man who has any heart or any feeling or who believes in justice could be opposed to this provision.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman is aware that when fathers and mothers are taken from the quota, 5,000 or 6,000 a year will be taken from the quota?

Mr. SABATH. I can not yield further. I was gentleman enough to yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GREEN. I was going to ask a question.

Mr. SABATH. But not for a speech. The gentleman immediately made an erroneous statement. He said it would admit 5,000 or 6,000 of these fathers and mothers. The gentleman is too prone to listen to some of those people who make these unjustifiable and erroneous charges.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. How many will be eligible for entry?

Mr. SABATH. I presume there may be 200 or 300 or 500.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Has an effort been made to ascertain the number?

Mr. SABATH. Yes. The department says it will be only 200 or 300; but let us say it will be 1,000. They are the parents of American citizens who can not and will not compete with American labor. They will become consumers. Is there anyone who will say to an American citizen who wishes to provide for his father and mother, his aged parents, "No; you can not provide for your father and mother"?

Unfortunately, there are some who will; but whenever we find a man who is ready to take care of his aged parents without any cost to the Government and who is willing to give a bond guaranteeing that they will not become charges upon the country, how can anyone say, "No; we will not grant American citizens the privilege of bringing their fathers and mothers, although they are ready to guarantee to provide for them as long as they live"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington rose.

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman if we can get an understanding about this matter. What possible objection can there be to bringing in these fathers and mothers within the quota?

Mr. SABATH. I will answer that question. Only five minutes ago the gentleman from Washington himself complained about the stringent rule adopted by the department whereby people are refused admission, notwithstanding the fact that under the law they have the right to come here. It is an inhumane rule that has been issued by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is quite wrong.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us get this right. My opinion is that, no matter whether they are excess quota or within the quota, the regulation of the department with respect to becoming a public charge still prevails; and I said I would offer an amendment later, in case we adopted an amendment bringing them all within the quota, by which a finger would point to the fact that less restriction should apply to the provision with respect to becoming public charges. It is entirely a humane proposition.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman heard what I said about his statement. I complimented the gentleman upon the fact that he appreciates the conditions that exist; but if we amend this bill then these unfortunate parents will be again at the mercy of the inhumane gentlemen who represent our country in foreign lands. We must bear one thing in mind: If we put them within the quota, the quota of some of the countries is only 100, and in many of the countries these people will have to wait 5, 8, and even 10 years before they will be reached under the quota. This is the reason an effort is being made to let them in outside of the quota. In a majority of instances many of them have already waited 5 or 6 or 8 or 10 years; and, if we do not pass the bill as it is now, they will have to wait perhaps another 5 or 10 years, and then because of old age may have no chance to enter at all. So I say that decency and humanity demand that we pass this bill just as it is and not adopt any amendments.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, consideration of humanizing the immigration law without in any way tearing down the bars has been before the House for some time. My colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] has labored very patiently and has brought out a bill which I believe will entirely clear up the situation.

The suggestion made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], who is also an expert on immigration, to give instructions to our consular representatives I do not believe would be effective; in fact, I believe it is the intention of the author of the bill, and of the committee, that while the parents are exempted from the quota they must qualify in every other respect, and the children must show, affirmatively, that the parents will not be permitted to become public charges.

As to the attitude of the consular officers, as has been suggested, I agree they have been in many instances arbitrary. If there could be uniform rules and reasonable requirements, the administration of the law could be carried on properly, particularly in these times of economic stress.

So it seems to me the parents who are now waiting and who have been waiting for many years and can qualify under the bill should be allowed to come in. They must first be the parents of American citizens, and, secondly, the children must show affirmatively that they are able and willing to provide for their parents. These conditions being met, the bill in no way, directly or remotely, will disturb labor conditions in this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the pinch is not a lack of holes in the quota, but the fact that the parents can not show that the children are really going to support them. My suggestion is only a supplemental one, and I said it would only be a guidepost to the State Department. I think this debate will perhaps serve the purpose. I am trying to secure a little less rigidity where the son can make a showing that he can support his people for a year or so. I can not guarantee that I will support my family for the next year, or the year after, but I shall try.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the Government is entitled not only to a showing but reasonable assurance that these parents will be reasonably cared for.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In my State support of parents is compulsory, and we can compel a child to support his parents. I think this is so in many States; and when we are granting nonquota status I think a provision requiring them to show affirmatively that they will be properly cared for is wholesome and necessary, and if we can give them a nonquota status, that ought to clear up the situation. The rule should be adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, this amendment proposed by my colleague is merely for the purpose of destroying this legislation. He says his amendment is more liberal than mine. This is the first time since I have been in this Congress and on the Committee on Immigration that I have heard a statement made by my good colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, that he is more liberal than I. We do not want any liberality; we are coming to this Congress for justice, to remove a discrimination that has been on the statute books for almost 10 years.

Everyone concedes that we are discriminating against aged parents, and not one solitary move has been made in all these years to bring in these old people together. Why?

In some countries it will take a hundred years before their quota number will be reached. In other countries it will take 40 years or 30 years. There are about 200 that have been waiting on the quota list now for 10 years.

It would be almost impossible for these aged parents ever to see their children who are American citizens. At least 30 died in the last 3 or 4 years without having reached their quota, and who have not seen their children for 20 years.

Now, ladies and gentlemen of this Congress, do you want to go on record as saying to the American son that he is not permitted to bring in his aged father over 60 years of age because he happened to be born in Syria or England or some other country? Are you prepared to say to a son or daughter who is an American citizen that he or she shall be deprived of the love and affection of these aged parents?

Ladies and gentlemen of this Congress, this is not a case where we are trying to open the gates of immigration. This is a case that will keep families together, and the money that is being sent to foreign countries for the support of these aged people will remain in the United States.

Let me give you an example, which you can verify: A case where a man has been waiting for the quota almost 11 years in Syria. Finally the mother died waiting for the quota. They brought the father to Habana, where he has been burning under the torrid sun for three years.

The children are worth thousands of dollars, so that there is no danger that the parents will become a charge. Still they can not get the father in, although he is over 81 years of age. Why? Because the quota of Syria has been full.

Now, this only affects from 100 to 195. They must comply with the law and all the rules and regulations of the department. They must be physically able, and the son must prove that he is financially responsible to provide and look out for his aged parents.

The Commissioner General of Immigration is for this proposition 100 per cent. Every humane society supports it, almost everyone I know supports it except my good friend Mr. JENKINS. What is his objection? He wants to amend the bill and make it 65 years of age.

Here it is on page 4 of the printed hearings:

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Practically few, if any, corporations will employ anybody over 55 years of age.

Mr. JENKINS. Raise it to 65 and you remedy that.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the question of letting down the bars by this bill in favor of minor children by admitting these aged parents was considered. I read again from the printed hearings, on pages 4 and 5:

Mr. DIES. Have we any assurance not to admit large numbers of them?

Mr. HULL (the Commissioner General of Immigration). We certainly have the limitation in so far as it must meet the approval of the bureau, and the department is much opposed to bringing in such children.

Mr. JENKINS. No children ordinarily are born of parents after they are 50 years of age; but a man 65 may be married to a woman of 25, have a horde of children, and they can come in.

I think that he ought to be complimented—a man 65 years of age, marrying a girl 25 years old, and having a horde of children—and that is the opposition to this bill! The proposed amendment is nothing but a move to destroy this humane piece of legislation. I very seldom get on the floor and appeal to you for any particular legislation, but I ask you to do a human act to-day and pass this bill and bring these old people in without any more red tape, such as we have been having for 11 years.

Mr. MILLARD. This is practically a unanimous report from the gentleman's committee?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; except as to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], who has filed minority views.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, the opposition to this bill is not captious at all. It is not as trivial as my good friend, the chairman of the committee, Mr. DICKSTEIN, would have you believe. He read only one little question and answer from the record of the hearings, and what he read is immaterial. There is a basic proposition involved here. It is an important proposition, and this is what it is: Are we going to let down the bars? Are we going to change and increase the quotas? I know there are a great many Members here who have publicly taken the position, time and time again, that they are not in favor of letting down the bars any further. What is the use of letting down the bars when it is not necessary? This legislation is not necessary at all, and it is not a matter of humanity. There is no great demand for this change.

For the benefit of the Committee on Rules, I should state that I do not know why some of us who were opposed to this bill were not before the Committee on Rules. I had no invitation. If I did get an invitation or notice, then I was away when the hearing was had. I am making no complaint at not having been notified.

Mr. GREEN. I would like to say in that connection that I have violently opposed this bill from the beginning to end, in committee and otherwise, and I did not know when the Rules Committee met.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course I had nothing to do with notifying Members, but I understand the gentleman from Ohio was out of the city at that time.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Did the committee consider letting these come in within the quota, giving them preference?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; that is what my amendment proposes to do.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. How about the children—unmarried children 21 years of age?

Mr. SABATH. That is the present law.

Mr. JENKINS. Further, with reference to the minority views, this is only a matter of detail, but I filed minority views; and several members of the Committee on Immigration—I do not know how many, five or six—told me that they would like to sign the minority views with me, but when it came time to file them we were in a hurry, and I filed them without getting the signature of other Members and let it go at that. I do not know who they were, but it is a small matter. What is the meat of this matter? Under the present law 153,000 immigrants can come in under the quota each year. That is the limit.

That is the total European quota, 153,000 a year. Since the application by immigration officials of more stringent tests for entry by immigrants the number has been decreased greatly; only a small percentage comes in now, but when business conditions become normal again the number will jump up again.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman state how many did come in last year?

Mr. JENKINS. I do not yield.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman does not mean to mislead the House?

Mr. JENKINS. No. I stated positively that not nearly that many came in. This is due to the foresight and statesmanship of Mr. Hoover in promulgating an order to the immigration authorities to be more strict. Now, let us consider the nonquota immigrants. Under the present law 261,000 people can come in each year nonquota. We have so many exceptions to the quotas that exceptions predominate and outweigh and outnumber the quota itself. Our policy has been to keep these exceptions down, to keep the quota down and to keep as many people within the quota as possible; and, in order to do that, about four years ago we adopted what I think was a very fine plan, which provides preferences within the quota. That is the solution of this whole proposition. Under the present law we divide preferences within the quota in this way. We take 50 per cent within the quota and make a preference and divide that 50 per cent among the fathers and mothers and among the husbands married after June 1, 1928.

The rest of the quota, or the other 50 per cent, goes to the farmers. For years members of the committee have been wanting to do away with the preference of the farmers. The farmers say there are enough farmers now, but there are a few Members in the other body who have been for years guarding this privilege to the farmers. Here is what we propose to do in my amendment: We propose to take the whole preference and give it to fathers and mothers, and do away with the matter of the husbands, because it is not necessary, inasmuch as we passed a bill through the House putting husbands outside the quota, which bill is now in the Senate. We will take the whole preference and give it to the fathers and mothers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. Mention has been made here that there are some countries in which the list of fathers and mothers desiring to come is so long as not to be reached for 60 years. That is not the fact. There may be many a father and mother who can never come in because they are not physically fit. The father may be an imbecile or in such physical condition that he could not come in at all, and there are thousands of other people who stand in line and who can not come because of some good reason or another. Let me give you these statistics furnished by the Department of State, and the statistics are correct. There are only five countries that are at all embarrassed now. In other words, there are fathers and mothers in only five countries standing back now. If you read my minority views, you will see what they are. There are a few standing back that have been rejected, and I can give you the figures on this, but in no country under the present law except two is there any waiting list, and those who have been rejected may have to stay back forever.

These countries are Rumania and Turkey. Everybody can come in from either Rumania or Turkey within three or three and one-half years, under the present law, but my amendment proposes to take away the preference to the farmers and the preference to the husbands, and give the total preference to the fathers and mothers. When this is done the fathers and mothers eligible will be able to come from all quota countries.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was this proposition which the gentleman is discussing raised in the committee when this bill was under consideration?

Mr. JENKINS. I do not know. I was not before the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I mean before the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And the committee voted against it?

Mr. JENKINS. Now, with reference to the vote of the committee, there has been a feeling in the committee all the time, ever since four years ago when a bill was adopted to do away with all the clamor about separation of families, to do everything within reason to bring families together. There was never any very bitter opposition with reference to the fathers and mothers, except on the cardinal proposition that we should not lay down the bars and go outside the quota. That was brought up specifically by myself at different times. I do not know whether I was present at the time the final vote was taken. I find several other Members do not know whether they were present when the vote was taken. I can not give the gentleman the exact facts on that proposition. If a vote was taken I do not know and neither do I know the result. I know that I have always been against letting down the bars.

Let me go back to the proposition I was discussing. If my amendment is adopted, the fathers and mothers in every quota country who are eligible to come in will be able to come. At present there are two countries in which the active demand for entrance by fathers and mothers of American citizens exceeds the quota. What does my amendment propose in these two countries? It proposes that if the quota is not sufficient to meet the demand and that there is a waiting list, that all those eligible to come may be permitted to come if they come within one year after the passage of this act, and such surplus will come in in addition to the quota number. The records show that this number will be very small, probably not more than 200. The object of that is to clear up this clamoring about fathers and mothers and let every person everywhere who is a father or mother of American citizens, who is qualified to come into this country, come in if they can within one year.

The ranking member of the committee, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, was right when he said that our bill is a fairer bill and more liberal than the bill of the chairman himself, because the chairman's bill restricts these fathers and mothers to those over 60 years of age. My amendment fixes no age limit, but keeps them within the quota. Suppose a father is 61 years of age and a mother is 55. Then where are we? The father can come in and the mother can not. An age-limit restriction will work unfairness. Then the cry will come to reduce the age limit down to 55. My amendment does not limit the age at all, but it says, "We will bring in all the fathers and mothers within one year who are qualified to come in, and after that they will have to come in under the quota limitations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLACK). The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8174) to exempt from the quota fathers and mothers over 60 years of age of United States citizens.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8174, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the members of the committee will give sympathetic consideration to this bill, H. R. 8174. We have often been told, and it will permit of repetition, that all civilization revolves around family life, and if we strike at the family we strike at that civilization—its base.

Particularly we who come from the city districts are constantly importuned by people who camp on our doorsteps, begging and craving some help and assistance in the union of families, and we can not lend deaf ears to those persons. It would be cruel to do so. We strive with might and main, knocking at impenetrable doors, to get those families united.

Here is an opportunity to do something really and truly charitable, and yet that which does not depart from American traditions or institutions. We have always given asylum to the lowly, the tempest tossed, pioneering immigrant. Let us help unite with their fathers and mothers those already in.

We have situations where the ocean divides these families, and cruel law keeps them permanently asunder. This bill simply changes the classification of aged parents from preference status to nonquota status—allows parents over 60 years of age to come outside of the quota.

At present parents of American citizens are granted preferences in the quota. But in several countries the quotas are so small that preferences are meaningless. In other countries those on the waiting list are so numerous that preference again becomes meaningless. Citizens can easily bring in their English parents, because the quota is large—half the quota is taken up by those with preferential status, like aged parents. In the case of countries of southern and eastern Europe the delay is indefinite, because quotas are inconsequential or because those on the waiting list exhaust the preferences within larger quotas for 10 or more years to come. The Rumanian quota is 295. Fifty per cent, or 147 roughly, is available for preference. But 1,156 want to come as preferential aliens, including aged parents. Only 147 can come each year. It will take almost eight years to bring them over. Suppose your aged mother or father were involved. Would you want to wait eight years to get them? You would not wish to suffer for them that long.

Commissioner General of Immigration Hull rightly approves of the bill. He indicated at the hearings that comparatively few would enter, and that, therefore, no violence was being done to the principle of immigration restriction. In part, he said:

> Economically, it would be a good thing, and from a committee standpoint I think it is unquestionably a good thing. I can not see any reason why a parent, with a child in this country who has money to support his father or his mother, should not be permitted to come here. It is uneconomical to send that money to foreign countries to support these parents.

Bringing in these aged parents would not affect American workingmen. No jobs would be taken from them. No one employs a man over 60 years of age. Surely women above 60 are not employed.

Furthermore, no parents could come in unless the children guaranteed their support. That support usually excludes their being employed. There would be more mouths to feed; more backs to clothe. Consumer demand would be increased. That in effect would help American labor.

I have been in this House for almost 10 years, and the vital objection to liberal immigration laws has always been this, "We do not want any more new stocks; we do not want any more new roots; no more new families." This bill will not give any more new stocks and will not give any more new roots. No more new families will have been started if this bill is passed. There should not be the fear of spreading the alien blood strains or streams amongst our people.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. We are dealing with human souls in this situation. They can not be dealt with as sacks of potatoes or bushels of wheat. The quota system does that. Parents, husbands, wives, and children of citizens can not and should not be quota-ed or quartered. They should be completely united.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to be very fair, but I want to call attention to the fact that the probabilities are that if fathers and mothers are admitted outside the quota, we will have next-stock immigrants.

Mr. CELLER. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that when you admit into this country persons over 60 years of age that you are admitting new stocks—that is, the potentialities of new families?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No.

Mr. CELLER. That would be flying in the face of recognized biological knowledge generally. It is a pretty far-fetched argument. Of course, an old man of, say, 65 might marry a flapper and have children by her. There will be mighty few such cases. I am willing to take a chance. The Bible says Isaac was born when Abraham was 109. But times have changed. There is not much chance of men or women of the ages contemplated in this bill having many, if any, new children.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman misunderstands me. It opens the door as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Permit me to call to your attention the fact that we are continually naturalizing aliens in the United States.

During the year 1930, 169,377 aliens became citizens of the United States under the naturalization law. Those 169,000 aliens have a right under the present law to bring in their fathers and mothers as members of a preferential class. In 1931, 143,495 aliens became citizens. It is reasonable to believe that at least 10 per cent of the aliens who became citizens have a father or a mother in Europe so you can readily see there will be no end to the chain of those seeking to come to the United States as a parent of a citizen.

This is not a question of 200 or 300 parents in Europe who desire to come to this country. As we naturalize, we transfer from one class to another the parents of the new-made citizens.

The difference between the bill of the chairman of the committee [Mr. DICKSTEIN] and that of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] is this, we have a quota of 153,000 who may come here each year from foreign countries. Incidentally, about 98,000 came in last year, the lowest year on net immigration of any since the Civil War. About 35,000 net came to the United States. However, when times get better and they are able to come in, notwithstanding the likely to be public charge provision, we will have annually 15,000 or 20,000 additional fathers and mothers of American citizens knocking at our doors under the bill of the chairman, because they will be exempt from the quota.

If the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] is enacted for one year all those parents of American citizens who desire to come will have the right to do so notwithstanding the quota.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. Does the gentleman think it would be fair to treat the children and the parents differently during this year or next year than they may be treated 15 years from now?

Mr. CABLE. I do. If it is going to be a conflict between these parents and the American workmen, I say it is our duty to look after the American workmen.

Mr. CELLER. Does the gentleman think a person 60 years of age or over would conflict with the aims, wishes, and desires of American workmen?

Mr. CABLE. I will venture to say that most of the men who come in who are over 60 years old are able to work.

The bill of the chairman of the committee seeks to enlarge the quota which was established in 1924 by an overwhelming vote of the House. In my opinion it would permit 10,000, 15,000, or 20,000 now restricted by the quota to be admitted annually without regard to the quota. We will have 150,000 or 200,000 aliens naturalized year after year, and when they become citizens, under the provisions of the chairman's bill, their parents would come in outside the quota.

So the question as between the two bills is this: Do you desire to increase the present quota of 153,000 established under the bill of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] when he was chairman of the committee, to one hundred and sixty, one hundred and seventy, or one hundred and eighty thousand, by transferring from quota to nonquota, or do you want to say that as a humane move you will let the parents of every American citizen who wish to come in within the next year to do so notwithstanding the quota?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In the amendment no age limit has been fixed for the father or mother. Under the committee bill the age is fixed at 60 years.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] two additional minutes.

Mr. CABLE. I will say to the gentleman from New York that the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] is more liberal, so far as age of parents is concerned, than the bill of the gentleman from New York, because in the latter bill an age limit of 65 is fixed, whereas in the Jenkins bill there is no age limit. The Jenkins bill makes it possible for the parent of an American citizen, who may be 45 or 50 years of age, to come to the United States notwithstanding that age.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Does not the gentleman from Ohio know that the very men who are proposing this amendment voted down every age that was proposed by the committee and finally insisted upon 65 years as the age limit; that they would not accept 45 years of age; they would not accept 50 years of age? Does not the gentleman know that is the fact?

Mr. CABLE. In my opinion, it is more important to save the quota Congress established by an overwhelming vote than it is to quibble over age limits.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Ohio favors the Jenkins amendment because it is more liberal. Is that right?

Mr. CABLE. I did not say that. I said it protects the quota.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. CABLE. No; it is more liberal as to the age at which parents may come to the United States, but it protects the sanctity of the quota established by Congress in our restrictive immigration act of 1924.

Mr. SABATH. I thought the gentleman was mistaken when he made that statement.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. It lifts the quota, as I understand it, to the extent of one year.

Mr. CABLE. As to parents of American citizens; yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For one year's time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Ohio one additional minute.

Mr. CABLE. For one year under the Jenkins amendment the fathers and mothers of American citizens may come to the United States, notwithstanding the quota; but when the year has expired the quota goes back to 153,000, where it is now and where it should be maintained or reduced.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I favor the bill as reported by the Immigration Committee. The preceding speaker let the cat out of the bag. The speakers prior to his address indicated that if we would adopt the amendment which is to be offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] all the fathers and mothers over 60 would be taken care of under the quota and could join their sons and daughters in this country who are American citizens. Then comes along the third batter, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE], and he approaches his opposition to the bill as reported from a different premise, indicating that if the bill as reported were enacted into law there would be a flood of these fathers and mothers 60 years of age and over coming into this country. But, my Republican colleagues, I hope you will not follow the Republican members of the Immigration Committee who are now talking, bleeding, and dying in the name of preserving our immigration laws. You older Members will recollect that when a multimillionaire milk producer from the State of Connecticut could not bring his wife in here under the immigration law because she had been convicted of three criminal charges, the Republican members of the Immigration Committee, including some who are to-day crying to preserve the quota, reported a bill, a special privilege bill, if you please, and spoke in favor of it on the floor of the House. They asked for an amendment of the immigration law so that this multimillionaire could bring in his wife, notwithstanding the fact that she was a criminal and had been convicted on three different occasions. I refer to the Ulrich bill (S. 3691), passed in the Seventy-first Congress.

If you gentlemen wanted to preserve the integrity of our immigration laws and the quota, you had an opportunity at that time.

But now, my friends, let us look at the economic side of this question. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] is fearful that if this bill was enacted as reported by the committee, a multitude of fathers and mothers 60 years of age or over would come into this country and thereby destroy the principles of the immigration quotas. Now, just reason with yourselves. How many of those aged parents 60 years of age and over will compete with American workers should they be permitted to join their American-citizen sons and daughters in this country?

I am one of those who have supported a restrictive nondiscriminatory immigration law in order to protect the workers of America from the unfair competition of cheap foreign labor. On an identical basis I have supported a protective tariff in order to protect the workers of America and the industries of America from the unfair competition of cheaply produced foreign importations.

What is the difference whether you repeal the immigration law and allow the many millions who are now knocking at our doors to come into this country and compete at low wages with the American workers, or whether you destroy the protective tariff, like some of our demagogic Democratic brethren attempt to do, and allow millions of workers on the farms and in the factories in foreign lands to send their products into America to compete with the products of American labor and American industries without proper tariff protection?

We know that the sons and daughters who are citizens of this country will support their aged parents, whether they are here or in foreign lands. For the best interests of our workers and our people and our surplus, would it not be better to permit those American-citizen sons and daughters to bring their fathers and mothers over 60 years of age into this country and support them here, consuming the products of the American farms and American industries, rather than to permit good, hard cash to go from these sons and daughters to foreign lands in order to support their parents abroad?

I sincerely hope this bill will be enacted as recommended by the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five minutes. I shall endeavor to make another statement and try to make the proposal as clear as possible.

WHAT THE JENKINS AMENDMENT PROPOSES TO DO

The situation seems to create two classes or divisions—those who believe it would be better to permit the relatives, particularly the fathers and mothers, to come within the quotas, which are now about 153,000 for European countries, and being used to a very small degree only, and those who believe that these parents should come nonquota, leaving the quotas open for new immigrants if the time comes again when immigration wants to flow into this country up to that limit.

There is nothing to be really disturbed about. The only two countries, as the gentleman from Ohio stated, where there is a surplus of fathers and mothers trying to come to children here are Rumania and Turkey. Rumania has a quota of 295 openings for new immigrants, under which fathers and mothers can now come, and the 50 per cent preference would be 147. In Rumania the persons who want to come to the United States are 515. Presumably they are mostly relatives. Turkey has a quota of 226. She has 354 on the active register trying to get here and 1,506 on the inactive register. They have tried and tried but have quit because they are not now ready, do not have the money, or for some other reason.

Those of us behind the Jenkins amendment believe that general immigration will be at such a low ebb for a number of years that all these relatives can come freely within the quota. So we have no age limit at all for parents. Why? Because parents in England, Wales, and Germany, as well as other countries, except the few countries I have named, can now come within the quota.

We are providing to relieve the excess of demand in the small-quota countries, like Rumania, Turkey, Syria, and Bessarabia, and we grant one year for the parents in these countries to catch up, regardless of quota, because there will only be a few hundred at best. That being so, why should we have an age limit if we want to do the humane thing where the quotas are not enough for the fathers and mothers? After we have relieved this situation, it is our belief that the thing will run smoothly. Limited immigration will in itself reduce the appeal for fathers and mothers. By the relief we offer through the Jenkins amendment the excess arrival for one year from Turkey, Armenia, and Syria will not be enough to make many additions to the bread lines, even if hopeful sons and daughters can not support the parents as they now think they can. But if you keep nipping away at this immigration act and putting more and more people under the nonquota provision, pretty soon you will not have many worth-while immigration restrictions, although the demand in this country to-day is for more and more restriction. We all know that.

Th distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], now occupying the chair, asked a few minutes ago what was the trouble in the committee. Let me say to him that for years there has been considerable discussion whenever immigration restriction and relief of relatives has been considered. The question has been always before us, who shall be first, the wives or the parents. The wives were taken care of some time ago under the Jenkins preference plan. The others were left, and now the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] will offer an amendment to clear up that situation, wipe the slate clean, give an opportunity to previous amendments to the law by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS]. He has specialized on this phase of immigration. He has been right, and he is right now. Do not let your immigration restriction act be nipped and torn down piece by piece. We contend that the amendment is correct, proper, and generous. We want to help the parents as far as possible.

This is an old, old struggle where one side wants just as many places for new immigrants to come in as possible, hard times or no hard times, and the other side which contends that we have enough exemptions. The question is whether, in order to let a few relatives join their families, you want to open new quota opportunities for more immigrants.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I am a new member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. We gave this bill very deep consideration and I have based my opinion on the testimony before the committee.

The measure was recommended by the Department of Labor, it was recommended by the Commissioner General of Immigration, and therefore on that testimony I favor the bill. I believe it is humane. I believe any competition with the laboring men of this country by alien parents over 60 years of age whose children are American citizens would be inconsequential.

I am a strong restrictionist, but I am for this bill because it will alleviate many hardships due to the separation of families. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOKE].

Mr. COOKE. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Washington that this legislation falls into two general classes, but I do not quite agree with the classification that he makes. In all sincerity I am for this bill, but I do believe there is a movement on foot to destroy the force of the bill.

One class is desirous of having the fathers and mothers of American citizens brought into this country, while the opponents of the bill and those who seek to amend are desirous of having no legislation of this kind passed at this session.

The bill has gone through the Committee on Immigration. It has been very carefully considered in every detail. I do not know of any reason why at this late date we should be so terribly concerned about destroying the quota figures when that objection did not prevail when the bill was considered in the committee.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] states that some tens of thousands of people will be brought into this country if the bill is passed. I do not like to dispute those figures, but I question that statement very much.

The people we are seeking to bring in are not competitors in the labor market, and the idea of a quota law in the first place was to exclude from this country people who might come in and compete in the labor market with our own people.

We are bringing in people 60 years of age. They come here just for a few years for the purpose of basking in the friendship and protection of the hearthstones of their families. They are fathers and mothers of American citizens, and I say to you that many of us who are seated in this House to-day can look back a short time when perhaps our fathers and mothers were in the old country and were desirous of coming here and we were desirous of giving them our protection and care. These people, as I have said, come here to live just a few years in the sanctity and security of their son's or daughter's home and then to die. They are to be consumers. They are not people who will be taking something from us. They are now taking something from us, because, monthly, great sums of money are sent to the old countries for the support and maintenance of these old people. Let us bring them here and at the same time do a just and an equitable and a humane thing, a thing we should have done years ago when this bill was first passed.

Let us add to the wealth of the country by bringing these people here and letting them be supported by their sons and daughters. This is not a bill that is going to let in tens of thousands, but is only going to let in those who are able to pay their way or those who have sons and daughters who will pay their way.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, at the expense of being tedious, I feel I should respond to my good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] just to say in that connection that when he was fighting so valiantly with reference to the famous Ulrich case about which he talked he will remember that I was with him. He and I together waged an unsuccessful fight, but it was a warm fight, and we deserved to win, for we were right.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say that the gentleman helped to lead that fight on the bill, but the gentleman's colleagues who are with him to-day were on the opposite side of the fence.

Mr. JENKINS. Just one word further. I think my good friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], if he had understood thoroughly the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] and myself, would be right with us on this proposition, because this is a proposition that is right in line with the famous Ulrich case.

I have only one other proposition to advance. As my friend and colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] has stated, if the bill as proposed by the chairman of the committee should pass, it will open the door to a great many more immigrants.

Let me illustrate: Take the German quota—I can not give you the exact figures, but it is over 25,000 a year. I suppose there are about 3,000 coming in from Germany under the new regulations. Out of that 3,000 there will probably be 500 fathers and mothers. If this bill should pass, all of these fathers and mothers would go out of the quota and their places would be filled up by new stock, and the quota would be augmented by that number. It would open up the quota to that many. I think my good friend from Wisconsin will be with us yet on this bill.

Now, one minute further. I find that some Members did not understand my first remarks with reference to the farmers. Here is the situation—the preference for the farmers is not eliminated. Here is what we do. We give the first preference to the fathers and mothers, if necessary, and then if there is any country in which the fathers and mothers do not consume all of the quota, the farmers will come in up to a certain percentage.

Mr. BURTNESS. What is that percentage?

Mr. JENKINS. Twelve and one-half per cent.

Mr. BURTNESS. After the fathers and mothers preference has been exhausted?

Mr. JENKINS. Twelve and one-half per cent of the original quota.

Mr. BURTNESS. Under the present law there is no priority between the various classifications given preference under the quota.

Mr. JENKINS. That is right.

Mr. BURTNESS. Of course, in the substitute you intend to offer, which I understand follows substantially H. R. 12354, you are proposing to change that feature of the immigration law which has not been particularly discussed here to-day, namely, the preference or priority rights of various classifications in the nonquota provision.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; I might say in answer to the gentleman's observation that in the small countries we are giving a preference to the fathers and mothers. The fathers and mothers coming from Norway, Sweden, Belgium, and Germany, there is no stress in those countries for the fathers and mothers at all, and neither is there any in regard to the farmers. The quota takes care of them. But in the two small countries in southern Europe there is a stress coming from the fathers and mothers and relatives.

Mr. BURTNESS. Let me ask the gentleman another question. In regard to the preference to those skilled in agriculture, suppose in one of the countries in which there is a quota of more than 300, where the agricultural preference applies, there is no stress there in connection with the aged parents of citizens of the United States, why limit those skilled in agriculture under your proposition to 12½ per cent of the total quota?

Mr. JENKINS. I will say that the reason we put that limit in is that we had to put in some limit, because another preference comes in after the farmers, and that is in response to a clamor heard all over the country three or four years ago to reunite families. That class is the class of aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens and who have taken out their first papers. The present law provides that they should be preferred after the farmers to bring in their wives and children. To give them some chance we must limit the number of farmer preferences.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman refers to children of aliens who have been admitted permanently?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; wives and children.

Mr. BURTNESS. There is, of course, also a preference for that class.

The gentleman's proposed substitute has considerable merit to it, but it raises the important issue of whether the Congress stands ready to-day and can legislate intelligently in determining the priorities to be given to these three preference classes within the quota provision when now they all have somewhat an equal chance, and the consuls can pass on the matter in accordance with the facts at hand in each individual case. I have some doubt of the advisability of raising that question now.

Mr. JENKINS. I think that, if we look over the record and see how many farmers come from this class, we will see that 12½ per cent will fully take care of them.

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, 1 per cent will adequately take care of them as conditions are at present, but that was not the case when it was reasonably profitable for people to engage in agriculture. Of course I assume that this legislation is not purely emergency legislation but is permanent, and we should consider the future as well as the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three minutes. I was very glad indeed that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] asked the question he did. This amendment was introduced in the form of a bill on the 27th of May, 1932. The bill under consideration was introduced seven months ago. I did not know about this proposed amendment, except that Mr. JENKINS or Mr. JOHNSON last night got busy and sent out notices in a quiet way to some Members that they were going to propose an amendment, without even giving me, as the chairman of the committee, the benefit of looking at their amendment. If it were any good, I would accept it. Now, at this last minute, they propose it. You take a country with a quota of 100. You only permitted 50 per cent for fathers and mothers, certain husbands, farmers, their wives, and their minor children. In this proposed amendment, on page 2, they fix 12½ per cent for farmers. Is that what they call fair and liberal legislation?

Mr. FOSS. Is there any evidence of any scarcity of farmers in this country to-day?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. None at all. In fact, I was ready to repeal that provision long ago, but they would not let me repeal that provision. What is the purpose of putting in the provision of 12½ per cent of the quota for farmers when the present law has no limitation on the first 50 per cent of the quota? Who has a better chance to get to the consul, an old man who has probably been waiting there for years or a young alien farmer full of vim and vigor? He will get a better opportunity, and yet they give the farmer 12½ per cent! What is the purpose of it? The purpose is to destroy this legislation, and nothing else.

Mr. FOSS. As a matter of fact, there ought to be more of our young men on the farms.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Absolutely; and I assure gentlemen that if I knew that one of these old men would take away one job from anybody, I would be the first to keep him out of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. There being no further requests for time the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (a) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 8, sec. 204 (a)), is amended to read as follows:

"(a) An immigrant who is the unmarried child under 21 years of age, or the wife of a citizen of the United States, or the husband of a citizen of the United States by a marriage occurring prior to June 1, 1928, or the father or the mother of a citizen of the United States, if such father or mother is over 60 years of age."

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GREEN: Page 1, strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as all the time was not consumed, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I object.

Mr. GREEN. I am not surprised at this objection. I rather think there will be more time consumed before this bill is passed than the five minutes that I request. Several minutes were remaining on each side of the aisle, and several minutes to be consumed on the rule. I requested time to explain the bill as I see it, but the chairman objects, and I utilize the House rules. I have opposed this bill ever since I have been a member of the committee, and with the help of colleagues we have been able heretofore to prevent the passage of this bill. In the committee I was joined by several of my Democratic and Republican colleagues in opposition to the bill. We had all expected to join in the minority report, but this report was not offered to us. I admonish my colleagues that if you are for immigration restriction you should vote against this bill. Practically all of the patriotic organizations of our country, all of those who are for restrictions, are opposed to this bill. This bill is the result of years of effort by the alien bloc to break down our immigration laws. When you remove parents from the quota you leave room for others to take their place in the quota. If your organganized-labor groups want you to admit more men to compete with them, then vote for this bill. If you want to add to the 8,000,000 now unemployed in this country, vote for this bill. If you want to tear down the immigration laws, vote for this bill.

We restrictionists have been unable to get our restriction bills brought to the floor for action, but bills for liberalization of our immigration laws are coming up in rapid succession. The other day the House passed the aliens' unemployed husbands' bill. Now, here is this bill to let the unemployed parents come in. The proponents of this legislation plead for the reuniting of families, as though America had separated them. But do you realize that when their children came here they knew what the provisions of immigration laws were? They abandoned their parents and left them in a foreign land. Now they undertake to say that the laws of the United States and that the American citizens have discriminated against those who have been left behind. They voluntarily abandoned their parents when they came here; the Congress did not separate them. But that is not the whole story. When I asked the direct question of the State Department, "How many eligible parents are now barred from coming in under the existing law?" they refused to say that the number exceeded 50. I refer you to the hearings. Do not take my word for it, because these figures may be disputed. The officials of the Department of State and the Department of Labor are in a position to know the number now eligible to enter, but who are in countries with exhausted quotas. They told our committee that such cases would not exceed 50. Are we to upset our immigration laws to let in 25 Turks and 25 Rumanians? These are the two countries with filled quotas. This bill would remove from the quota all eligible parents of all quota countries, and all of this to benefit not more than 50 Turks and Rumanians. I believe these are the two small countries with filled parents' quota.

Our Nation is a restriction Nation. I ask you, as restrictionists, if it is worth the price you are paying? When these aliens came here we gave them the protection of the American flag and permitted them to have the privileges of our institutions and industries. In fact, they have enjoyed rights and protection and have become citizens, many of them good citizens; but we did not separate them from their parents. They did it themselves, and if they are not satisfied let them return to their native lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request to proceed for five additional minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection I previously made if the gentleman wishes to explain the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Our chairman, though he and I have different views on immigration, is fair in not objecting to the additional time and I appreciate it. Our Nation has been liberal and considerate in making its immigration laws. Practically all worthy cases are now taken care of under the preference given parents under the quota. My friends, the Department of State has its representative in the foreign countries. They accept and pass upon applications of alien parents. They say that there are only a few parents in two small countries who can not promptly come to America if they so desire and if they meet the other requirements.

Examine the hearings before the Committee on Immigration, and those of you who are for restriction, do not be misled into voting for this subterfuge. The remote purpose of the bill is to break down our immigration laws. I hope there will be a record vote on this bill and that it will be spread throughout our entire country. It should be. My friends, I am thinking of the 8,000,000 people in our land who are to-day begging the Congress to provide employment for them in order that they may not beg at the hands of charity. They want employment.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Not just now.

We have in our midst to-day several hundred worthy men who some 15 years ago answered the call of our Nation, and they are here to-day asking that the Congress appropriate money to pay their adjusted-service certificates because they can not obtain employment. Are we to bring in another horde of aliens to take the positions which these ex-service men are asking of the Congress? They are begging for employment, and always ready to fight and work for their Government. Now is the time to choose between American unemployed citizens and more aliens. I shall vote against the bill and for American labor. This bill is one of the first wedges driven at the heart of our immigration laws. If we should pass this bill the alien bloc would be encouraged and their cause given great impetus.

I hope this bill will not be approved. I hope you will strike the enacting clause from it. If you fail to do that, then I hope you will accept the Jenkins amendment. You can not amend any bill sufficiently, which has for its purpose the tearing down of our immigration laws, to obtain my support.

We now have some 13,000,000 foreign born in our Nation and some 25,000,000 of foreign parentage. Yes; already too many; too many colors and creeds. America will do exceedingly well to Americanize those already here before letting in another horde. Racketeers and gangsters and those who are undertaking to destroy our Government by force, nearly all of them are foreigners. Read the crimes reported in the daily press and note the ever-increasing number of foreign criminals. In December, 1931, I believe, we had a demonstration here in front of the Capitol. The police had to dislodge them with tear gas. It is said that they were nearly 100 aliens.

My friends, you are encouraging communism. You are encouraging the overthrow of your Government by force. You are encouraging many of the things inimical to American institutions when you vote to repeal your immigration laws during these times of unrest. Those parents who would come in under this bill would, most of them, be good citizens, but I am speaking as a general immigration policy. Some of our very best citizens are of foreign birth. These are not the ones I am meaning. If parents are taken from the quota, others take their place within the quota, and this is no time to weaken our immigration laws.

I am opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has again expired.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose I should be reluctant to take the floor after listening to the burst of oratory of the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN]. Oh, he sympathized with the workers of this country. I yield now to ask the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] what practical difference is there between allowing aliens raising grapefruit and other citrus fruit in Rumania and Turkey to send that fruit to this country without adequate tariff protection than in allowing the aliens themselves to come over here and grow the citrus fruit on American soil?

Mr. GREEN. My reply to that is that if you look at it from a dollars and cents standpoint there is not much difference, but I am looking at our American institutions.

Mr. SCHAFER. What practical difference is there?

Mr. GREEN. One is a question of dollars and cents. The other is governed by every tradition of our American Government.

Mr. SCHAFER. To hear the gentleman from Florida talk about the traditions of Government would make one think he and all of his ancestors were born and raised in this country. His ancestors were aliens at some time. I do not believe he claims that the American Indians, the only real Americans, were his ancestors.

It makes me sick and tired to hear so-called statesmen from some of the Southern States where the notorious organization, the Ku-Klux-Klan, that preached against aliens, used to go out in the dark of night wearing a white sheet, a hood, and a mask, talk about our sacred institutions and in opposition to all aliens. To hear them so talk you would necessarily have to believe that they were absolute descendants of American Indians, who are the only real Americans in the first instance.

Now, gentlemen, there is not a particle of difference between repealing the immigration law and allowing millions of able-bodied workers to come into America and work in the factories and on the farms of America raising grapefruit, oranges, and tomatoes, and so forth, in the gentleman's district in Florida than it is to let them work on the farms and in the factories across the pond and send their products into America to compete with the products of American workers and American farmers without proper tariff protection.

The southern Democrats, particularly those below the Mason-Dixon line, are not consistent. Of course, we know you are demagogues on the tariff. You bitterly condemn the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. Your keynoter for the Democratic National Convention has claimed to be strongly opposed to the protective tariff, but he verily suffered, bled, and died in supporting an embargo tariff on oil and coal importations.

Mr. GREEN and Mr. BULWINKLE rose.

Mr. SCHAFER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN. Did I vote for the tariff?

Mr. BULWINKLE. To whom does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman, in speaking of consistency, tell me who elected him in Wisconsin?

Mr. SCHAFER. The people of the fourth congressional district of Wisconsin elected me. They do not fall for your Democratic demagogy and promises, promising everything under the sun, the way your Democratic voters in the South fall. The people of my district want results, not promises which are not kept, and in many cases can not be kept, because they are inconsistent.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman tell me whether he came here as an organization Republican or as a La Follette Republican?

Mr. SCHAFER. I am a Republican, and I supported old Bob La Follette until he passed on. I do not, however, follow some of his former followers who, in the name of the late Senator, asked that JOE ROBINSON be elected Vice President although he was the most bitter enemy the late Senator La Follette had when he was making a fight for his very political existence under the Democratic administration of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Is the gentleman consistent?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes; the gentleman is consistent. But your Democrats who have been denouncing the protective tariff of the Hawley-Smoot bill and who now claim to be for the protection of American workers on immigration are inconsistent. You have selected for your keynoter at the Democratic convention an oil and coal embargo-tariff Senator, and he will no doubt get up on the floor of your convention and make some more promises about reducing tariffs to bring back prosperity to the dear people who have been fooled by the Democratic demagoguery. He will no doubt attack the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill although he was one of the strongest supporters of the oil and coal tariff embargo in the revenue bill.

Look at the roll calls in the House and Senate on the votes of your Democratic leaders who claim to have been opposing tariffs. Those leaders voted for embargo tariffs to protect the products of your various Democratic States.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes. The gentleman is for a tariff on oil.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. Is the gentleman for or against socialism?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not—I think the gentleman should use that time in telling us whether he is for or against socialism.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Texas must have just come in the Hall. We are not debating socialism.

Mr. BLANTON. I am always here. I have been listening to the gentleman all the time. Is the gentleman for or against socialism?

Mr. SCHAFER. We are talking about immigration and the tariff. But the gentleman from Texas is one of these Democratic colleagues who strut forth and tell the American people what a monstrosity the Hawley-Smoot protective tariff bill is, how it caused all the troubles in this Nation and the nations of the world, but when they want an embargo tariff on antimony or antimony oxide or oil to protect the products of Texas the gentleman from Texas is right on the job with the other Democratic leaders from Texas asking for embargo tariffs.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman for or against socialism?

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Texas only asks that facetious question because he can not find an answer for his inconsistent position.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman for or against socialism?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GREEN) there were—ayes 2, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JENKINS: Page 1, strike out all of lines 3 to 11, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 6. (a) Immigration visas to quota immigrants shall be issued in each fiscal year as follows and in the following order of priority:

"(1) Quota immigrants of each nationality who are the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over. For a period of 12 months after the enactment of this act nonquota immigration visas may be issued to the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over if such fathers or mothers are not able to procure quota immigration visas before the expiration of such time due to exhaustion of the quota.

"(2) In the case of any nationality the quota of which is 300 or more, quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture, and the wives and the dependent children under 18 years of age of such immigrants skilled in agriculture, if accompanying or following to join them, but the number admissible under the preference provided in this paragraph shall not exceed 12½ per cent of the total quota.

"(3) Quota immigrants of each nationality who are the unmarried children under 21 years of age, or the wives of alien residents of the United States who were lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence.

"(4) Any portion of the quota of any nationality for such year not required for the issuance of immigration visas to the classes specified in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to other quota immigrants of such nationality.

"(b) The preference provided in subdivision (a) shall, in the case of quota immigrants of any nationality, be given in the calendar month in which the preference is established, if the number of immigration visas which may be issued in such month to quota immigrants of such nationality has not already been issued, otherwise in the next calendar month."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. On page 1, strike out all after the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JENKINS: Beginning on page 1, with line 3, strike out all of page 1, ending in line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, to strike out all of the language in the bill after the enacting clause.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURTNESS. I understand the gentleman's amendment to be to strike out all of page 1, which is the same thing as striking out section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JENKINS: Beginning on page 1, with line 3, strike out all of page 1, ending in line 11.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition on the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I was in favor of the first Jenkins amendment, which was ruled out of order.

If we are going to permit these European fathers and mothers to come into the United States at all—and I am against it—they should be charged to the quotas now authorized and they should come out of the regular quota. It is ridiculously absurd to continue to let foreigners come into the United States when there are 7,000,000 heads of American families walking the streets without jobs. [Applause.] If you had kept these foreigners out of the United States for the last 15 years there would not have been anybody out of jobs now. Does anybody deny that?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I do.

Mr. BLANTON. They have been coming in here by the thousands beyond the quota authorizations every month in the year. They come through Canada; they come through Mexico; they are smuggled in here on the Pacific coast; and they are smuggled in here on the Atlantic coast. I am for the American citizen here without a job first. [Applause.] I am for looking after him. I am for the Jenkins amendment to strike out the balance of this bill after the enacting clause. Why will we not do it?

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. Does the gentleman understand that I propose to ask that my amendment be made to section 2, because then I think it will be held germane and not subject to a point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I thought the gentleman offered his amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause in good faith.

Mr. JENKINS. To the first paragraph only.

Mr. BLANTON. I am still with the gentleman. I am going to vote for his amendment. I am more in favor of looking after the people in Wisconsin without jobs than I am after people in Europe. I am more in favor of looking out for the good people in Milwaukee, who are the friends of the former senior Bob La Follette, than I am for looking out for the people in Europe.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Always to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman did not vote the way he talks now when our people wanted a tariff to protect the workers in our industries in Milwaukee and when we wanted beer, which alone would put 30,000 of our people to work at once.

Mr. BLANTON. That could have been made a fair question but it was not properly put. I am against beer. I am for the eighteenth amendment. But I have voted for every single move here to equalize the cost of production on every lawful commodity in this country as against every foreign country and the gentleman can not deny that, but I am not for subsidies that enrich the few and make the many poor. I am for a proper equalizing tariff that properly protects every American industry and upholds the American standard of living, but I am against all subsidies.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield further. When the gentleman first came here there was not a better socialist in the Congress than the gentleman, except Meyer London. Meyer was a theoretical socialist as well as a practical one, but the gentleman soon became a socialist without being either theoretical or practical. [Laughter.] He recently has been getting away from socialism. At one time he has tried to be a conservative Republican and at another time he has posed as a radical Republican. Which is he now? I yield to my friend. Is he for or against socialism? Will he answer me that question in my time? He is a brave man, why does he not get up and answer?

Mr. SCHAFER. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I am opposed to socialism, and I also want to say that when we had a tariff on shoes and leather pending in the House the gentleman voted against it, and to-day we have 5,000 men out of jobs because the largest leather factories in our State are closed.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I voted for a tariff on both hides and leather. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that I voted against same. Now, I want to say this: The followers of the junior BOB LA FOL-

LETTE in Wisconsin and Milwaukee are the same people who used to follow the senior Bob La Follette. Is the gentleman for or against them?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Poor, unfortunate fathers and mothers of American citizens are obliged to suffer on account of the gentlemen from Texas and Florida and one or two others who do not seem to understand or realize conditions. One of them will try to make this House and the country believe that there is a tremendous immigration to this country. I hold here the reports of the Commissioner of Immigration and the Secretary of Labor, which show that in the fiscal year 1931 there were 10,237 foreigners who came to the United States above the number that had left this country.

The gentleman from Florida would have you believe that we are receiving millions of them and that millions are coming over the Canadian border and over the Mexican border and that the country is suffering to-day because of the tremendous immigration in the last 10 years. The immigration in the last 10 or 12 years has been almost nil. I do not think the yearly average is more than 20,000 or 25,000, and they are mostly children or parents or relatives of those who are here and do not take the places of American wage earners.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. No; I can not yield.

The gentleman from Texas is very much interested in the American wage earner. I have been here for many years and I well recall how the gentleman has voted on questions affecting organized labor. Almost invariably, the gentleman is on the other side. I know that during the 25 years I have been here, I have voted for every proposition that would be helpful and beneficial to the American wage earner. But I have a heart, and I believe this great Nation of ours should not be so small as to say to a few hundred parents of American citizens, some of them parents of boys who enlisted during a time when many gentlemen, who are opposed to these humane provisions, found it convenient to offer excuses, and who fought for our country, "You can not enter this country." I wish I had the time to go into this a little more thoroughly.

The gentleman from Ohio states that this law will grant relief to only a few parents in about three countries. The gentleman fails to name the other countries whose quota is 100, and he desires to have these people wait until they are reached under the quota. Here are some of the countries that have a limit of 100: Albania, Armenia, Australia, Bulgaria, Estonia, Iceland, India, Lichtenstein, Lithuania, Luxemburg, New Zealand, Persia, and a few other countries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman does not pretend that there is any demand in those countries at all from such relatives?

Mr. SABATH. This is not for relatives. This is merely to permit the parents of American citizens to come here outside of the quota. That is all that this bill provides for. Please do not try to mislead the membership of the House.

This is not an immigration question. This is not a question permitting thousands upon thousands to come here to take the places of American wage earners. This is simply a bill that would provide for the reunion of parents with their children, their sons and daughters, who are in a position to provide for and protect them; and their sons and daughters are desirous of doing this without any expense to the Government. Whenever you will find a son or a daughter willing, yes, anxious, to provide for his or her aged parents, you will find that he or she possesses the attributes that stand for the highest citizenship. Oh, I wish that the same could be said of the professional restrictionists who can be found lobbying around the corridors of the Capitol when immigration matters are being considered, and for whom the gentlemen from Florida [Mr. GREEN], Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], and Texas [Mr. BLANTON] speak.

Some of these gentlemen in their prejudices have endeavored to insinuate and charge that the present crisis is due to the immigration, notwithstanding the fact that within the last 18 years immigration was stringently restricted and only slightly exceeded the emigration. I regret that I have not the statistics before me which I could submit to this House showing the actual figures on immigration and emigration since the beginning of the World War.

And I wish that I could have the time necessary to compile statistics showing the amount of employment and the scale of wages during the years when immigration was at its height and the scale of wages and the amount of unemployment after the cessation of immigration. If that were possible, I am confident that the figures would clearly demonstrate that immigration has been helpful and beneficial; that it has helped to increase production on the one hand, and, on the other hand, tremendously increased the consumption, and thereby has increased and stimulated the business of the Nation.

It has often been stated that our surplus or export amounts to only 5 per cent, or possibly 6 per cent, of the production and the consumption in the United States. If the population in the last 18 years had increased by 5 per cent or 6 per cent, we would not be dependent upon the export or surplus, and could easily absorb it right in our own country.

I fully appreciate that this is not the time, especially when we have close to 10,000,000 people out of employment, to speak on this subject; nevertheless, I venture to predict that in the years to come unbiased economists will verify the correctness of my views on this all-important subject. But I am fully aware of the fact that the professional restrictionists will continue to impose their views on the majority of the American people for many years to come in precisely the same way that the professional prohibitionists have imposed their views on the people of the country. And it has taken the American people nearly 13 years to realize that they have been imposed upon by the prohibitionists, and I take it that it will take even longer than that for the people to realize that they have also been imposed upon by the professional restrictionists. Some day, when time permits, I shall try to give this House and the country a few facts and figures, but only, however, for the purpose of giving this question the consideration which, I believe, it rightfully deserves.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] to strike out the language of the first section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington) there were—ayes 40, noes 38.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. DICKSTEIN and Mr. JENKINS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 67, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of section 6 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 8, sec. 206 (a) (1)), is amended to read as follows:

"(1) Fifty per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants, without priority of preference as between such classes: (A) Quota immigrants who are the fathers or the mothers not over 60 years of age, or the husbands by marriage occurring after May 31, 1928, of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over; and (B) in the case of any nationality the quota for which is 300 or more, quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture, and the wives, and the dependent children under the age of 18 years, of such immigrants skilled in agriculture, if accompanying or following to join them."

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JENKINS: On page 2, strike out all of lines 1 to 17, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That section 6 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 6. (a) Immigration visas to quota immigrants shall be issued in each fiscal year as follows and in the following order of priority:

"'(1) Quota immigrants of each nationality who are the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over. For a period of 12 months after the enactment of this act nonquota immigration visas may be issued to the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over if such fathers or mothers are not able to procure quota immigration visas before the expiration of such time due to exhaustion of the quota.

"'(2) In the case of any nationality the quota of which is 300 or more, quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture, and the wives and the dependent children under 18 years of age of such immigrants skilled in agriculture, if accompanying or following to join them, but the number admissible under the preference provided in this paragraph shall not exceed 12½ per cent of the total quota.

"'(3) Quota immigrants of each nationality who are the unmarried children under 21 years of age, or the wives, of alien residents of the United States who were lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence.

"'(4) Any portion of the quota of any nationality for such year not required for the issuance of immigration visas to the classes specified in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to other quota immigrants of such nationality.

"'(b) The preference provided in subdivision (a) shall, in the case of quota immigrants of any nationality, be given in the calendar month in which the preference is established, if the number of immigration visas which may be issued in such month to quota immigrants of such nationality has not already been issued, otherwise in the next calendar month.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, and I would like to be heard if the Chair has any question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as the Chair will notice from the report, where there are comparative prints of what the changes are in existing law, the Chair will notice that this bill, as reported from the committee, refers to only one generic class of immigrants, namely, the fathers and mothers of citizens of the United States over 60 years of age. The first section refers to those mothers and fathers in the nonquota class. The second section under consideration refers to those fathers and mothers under the quota class.

Now, the pending amendment goes much further and seeks to change existing law in other particulars.

I notice one where it seeks to change existing law in other than that particular, and that is as to the application of the 50 per cent rule to those immigrants who come to our shores to follow agricultural pursuits.

There is no restriction, no purpose to change existing law, so far as the other classes are concerned under the 50 per cent quota in this section. This new bill, so far as it undertakes to amend it, merely extends the quota exemption as far as the 50 per cent applies to the fathers and mothers over 60 years of age.

Under existing law, page 4 of the compiled laws, there are three different subsections granting preferential consideration to various classes. The amendment seeks to change fundamentally the applicable provisions of other sections.

It is fundamental—and there are quite a number of decisions to support it—that where a committee reports a bill changing existing law only in one particular, it is not within the range of consideration for the committee to consider other matters.

I will agree that it has the right to change the age limit of fathers and mothers, the only generic class that is before the House for consideration.

This amendment violates the recognized principle that we shall not launch on the consideration of other matters from that which the committee has considered.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, the original law which is sought to be amended here by the bill introduced by the chairman deals with four classes of people. He seeks to amend that section, and he seeks to amend it by referring to only two classes of people.

I maintain that when he seeks to amend that by dealing with two classes and ignoring two classes that any amendment that would deal with all four of the classes would be germane.

For instance, there are four classes. The first is the fathers and mothers; second, husbands who married since June, 1928. He does not touch that at all. If he leaves the bill the way it is there would be one or two classifications not touched at all, and the bill would not be complete.

My amendment to the second section deals with the same people, but deals not in section 1 under the old law, but I put them into two paragraphs, not in two sections. My amendment deals with the whole paragraph, of which his bill only deals with a part. The part that he does not deal with is germane to the part with which he does deal, and I maintain that when I seek to deal with both parts that my amendment is germane.

I put the fathers and mothers in one so that they might have the first preference. He seeks to determine the preference, and I seek to determine the preference. He determines in one way and I in another, which is entirely germane. He seeks to dispose of the farmers and I seek to dispose of the farmers, which is entirely germane. Other matters in the section would have to rise and fall. He does not deal with them. I deal with them, but I do not change them in any way. I go on farther down in section 6, which he would have to do in order to make his bill complete, otherwise it is senseless and does not reach the situation at all, because when he repeals paragraph 1 in section 6 he leaves two or three administrative paragraphs that refer to one without any explanation; he emasculates the section so that it will mean nothing. All I do is to take the same people that he does. I deal with them and I run them through just exactly as the old law runs them through, without any deviation. I maintain my amendment is germane to everything contained in section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The bill as originally offered by the committee undertakes to amend two sections of the immigration law—section 6 and section 4. If the gentleman from Ohio had chosen in the first place to offer his proposed amendment as a substitute for the entire bill, with notice that if the amendment was agreed to he would then move to strike out the remaining section, he would have offered a germane amendment in the nature of a substitute to the entire bill, in the opinion of the Chair; but the gentleman from Ohio chose to offer his amendment as an amendment to section 1 of the bill. The Chair held on the interposition of a point of order that it was not germane. Thereupon the gentleman from Ohio elected to move to strike out section 1 of the bill. That motion prevailed, so that there is now left for the consideration of the committee only section 2 of the bill, and for the reason stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], in his argument, that section undertakes only to deal with one class of persons, whereas the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Ohio seeks to enlarge the field of operation of the section now in the bill and include other people in the proviso. The Chair is of opinion that it is not germane because it deals with a number of subjects other than that provided in the section of the bill now before the committee, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the same amendment, eliminating therefrom subsections (3), (4), and (b).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JENKINS: On page 2, strike out all of lines 1 to 17, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 6 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended by section 3 of joint resolution, approved May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 1009), effective July 1, 1928, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 6. (a) Immigration visas to quota immigrants shall be issued in each fiscal year as follows and in the following order of priority:

"'(1) Quota immigrants of each nationality who are the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over. For a period of 12 months after the enactment of this act nonquota immigration visas may be issued to the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over if such fathers or mothers are not able to procure quota immigration visas before the expiration of such time due to exhaustion of the quota.

"'(2) In the case of any nationality the quota of which is 300 or more, quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture, and the wives and the dependent children under 18 years of age of such immigrants skilled in agriculture, if accompanying or following to join them, but the number admissible under the preference provided in this paragraph shall not exceed 12½ per cent of the total quota.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane in that the amendment just offered affects a different class of immigrants to that under consideration before the committee, namely, mothers and fathers of American citizens. It affects a class which the committee has in no wise sought to amend by any amendment, the number that may be admitted into this country who are skilled in agriculture. It restricts the number in that particular to 12½ per cent and violates the rule that the committee is considering a subject foreign to that which was given consideration by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, my idea is that there is no question but that my amendment is germane with reference to fathers and mothers, but with reference to farmers the question would be on the 12½ per cent. If the Chair should rule that that is not germane, then I expect to offer another amendment eliminating that, but I maintain that the committee in its proposed amendment seeks to take the fathers and mothers over 60 years of age outside of the preference. When he does that he changes the preference of the farmer—he modifies it—and I maintain that if he modifies the status of the farmers, then my amendment would be germane to modify it also. That is what I seek to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the first paragraph of the gentleman's last amendment would be entirely germane; but for the reason stated in the former opinion of the Chair on the other point of order, the Chair is of opinion that paragraph 2 of the amendment comes within the inhibition suggested by the Chair in his former ruling and for that reason sustains the point of order.

Mr. JENKINS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, strike out all of section 2 down to and including line 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 6 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended by section 3 of joint resolution, approved May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 1009), effective July 1, 1928, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 6. (a) Immigration visas to quota immigrants shall be issued in each fiscal year as follows and in the following order of priority:

"'(1) Quota immigrants of each nationality who are the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over. For a period of 12 months after the enactment of this act nonquota immigration visas may be issued to the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over if such fathers or mothers are not able to procure quota immigration visas before the expiration of such time due to exhaustion of the quota.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, for the reason that section 6 of existing law relates only to quota immigrants. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio applies also to nonquota immigrants. The amendment of section 6, as submitted by the committee, applies only to quota immigrants. Following the ruling of the Chair a moment ago, when he suggested to the gentleman from Ohio that if he had offered his original bill with notice that he would offer it as a substitute to strike out the other section, the amendment now offered is not germane. In this instance the committee has voted not to consider any proposal toward amendment of the nonquota status by striking out section 1, which related to section 4. Now the gentleman from Ohio, by circumlocution, attempts to accomplish an amendment applying to the nonquota status, and for that reason the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BANKHEAD). The Chair is inclined to disagree with the gentleman from Wisconsin, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary situation in which this bill finds itself now is this: That my efforts to clarify matters of administration, which I hold are not at all vital, are out of the bill because the Chair has sustained the point of order, and it now leaves us with the kernel of the whole situation.

The controversy is whether or not fathers and mothers shall be kept within the quota or put outside the quota. The committee's bill sought to put fathers and mothers outside the quota; and my amendment now puts them in the quota, but provides that in any country where the quota is not sufficient, for one year's time, if anybody is denied because of the failure to be reached by the quota, that father and mother can step up and claim their right to come in. The ultimate result will be that every country in the world will be cleared up and they will then all be on the same basis; and when anyone seeks admission from any country in the world where the quota applies, the first preference will be given to fathers and mothers of American citizens, regardless of how old they are, because, as I explained awhile ago, the committee bill limits the age to 60 years. If a father was 61 and his wife was 59, the wife could not come in under the provision of the bill. By my amendment all those inequalities are wiped out and they can come in under this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The 12-month period provided in the gentleman's amendment is the time within which such nonquota visa may be obtained?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not necessarily the arrival here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No. There are four months extra under the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. If our foreign consular representative will apply existing quota regulations to eligible immigrants, to these deserving fathers and mothers, how many will be admitted under the gentleman's proposal?

Mr. JENKINS. All of them will be admitted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why so? The law to-day makes it mandatory to admit such part of quota immigrants, and yet the State Department is absolutely violating the law by barring those immigrants.

Mr. JENKINS. I agree in part with the gentleman on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the gentleman does not agree with me, because I do not believe the gentleman believes in meeting the full quota allowance and I do.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman answers his own question, then.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What happens to husbands of American citizens, provided for in the chairman's bill. That is out now?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes. There was a bill passed in the House which provided that all husbands married since June 1, 1928, came in under the law. That is already passed the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. With the exception of this one year, then, they must come within the quota class?

Mr. JENKINS. That is it exactly, and then only those who are qualified but can not be reached by the quota can come in outside the quota for that year.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. What happens to the husbands and wives of those who were married prior to June, 1928?

Mr. JENKINS. The husbands come in without any quota restriction now.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I am in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment, but I am uncertain as to the effect of the amendment in the form in which it is offered. I understood the amendment to provide that section 6 of the immigration act of 1924 shall be amended to read as follows. If the amendment is adopted in that form, it will entirely wipe out paragraphs 2, 3, and subdivision (b) of the present law. It is not the intention of the gentleman to do that?

Mr. JENKINS. No; it is not. My intention is that that should apply only to paragraph 1 of the present law.

Mr. HOCH. Then the gentleman should modify his amendment and provide that paragraph 1 of subdivision (a) shall read as follows.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment which I offered accordingly, to provide that paragraph 1 of subdivision (a) shall read as follows.

I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman not propose to simply amend the paragraph referred to of section 6, so that there should be provided that such and such a paragraph of such and such section be amended as follows, so as to leave all the other sections in the paragraph intact as now carried in the present law?

Mr. JENKINS. Exactly. I would amend subsection 1 of subsection (a) so that it would read as follows:

SEC. 6 (a).

Mr. STAFFORD. I would suggest, if the gentleman will permit, that the gentleman use the language of the committee bill, that subdivision (a) of section 6 of the immigration act of 1924 is amended to read as follows: "(1)" and then put in the language of the amendment.

Mr. JENKINS. That is what I meant to do exactly.

Mr. Chairman, I now submit the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JENKINS: On page 2, beginning with line 5, strike out all of line 5 down to and including line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) Quota immigrants of each nationality who are the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over for a period of 12 months after the enactment of this act nonquota immigration visés may be issued to fathers or to mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over if such fathers or mothers are not able to procure quota immigration visés before the expiration of such time due to exhaustion of the quota."

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. GREEN: Strike out all of page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Florida that, in the opinion of the Chair, this is not a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I do so solely for the purpose of following out the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. He stated the methods employed by American consuls in accordance with the rulings of the State Department on passing on applications for visas. The gentleman is quite right in his statement of extreme abuses and ridiculous rulings. I agree consuls should under the law probably look into the financial condition of prospective immigrants as well as the financial condition of the relatives as to whether or not the applicant is likely to become a public charge. Any reasonable inquiry I believe is within the scope of the law and quite proper under present economic conditions. But there have been some grave abuses; in fact, too many. For instance, there is a case where the applicant was required by the American consul to show that her relatives were able to provide for her. The family sent tax receipts on real estate, income-tax receipts, bank statements, affidavits, and after that was submitted the papers were returned to the applicant on the ground that consul could not determine if the financial condition of the relatives was the same at that time as they were when the affidavits were made. It was only a matter of getting the papers from New York to the country in Europe. Now, clearly such an attitude is not only unreasonable but contrary to law. There should be some recourse for such an unfair treatment of cases.

Another case was where an American consul in South America held that an alien who desired to come here as a visitor must exhibit $2,500 at least before a visitor's visa could be given to her. The family in New York sent $2,500 down there and the visa was refused because the consul stated that she might remain permanently.

It is such abuses, such extreme constructions of the administration of the law that are creating the difficulties. Such conditions should be corrected. It is quite within the power of the Secretary of State to establish some uniformity of administration and put an end to abuse of power and discrimination.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of course, that is not the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the last case, wanting to come in as a visitor, she could have put up a bond. There must have been some misunderstanding there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. She could not put up a bond in a foreign country. There are innumerable such cases——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. She could under an order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not the fault of the law in these cases; it is the fault of an extreme ruling with exaggerated and unreasonable administration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will help me, I would like to look into that case.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would be glad to have the gentleman do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I am taking the floor to call the attention of the author of the amendment to the fact that I question whether he has the amendment in the form he wishes it submitted for a vote. The gentleman will notice that the committee language carries out existing law, and that in the lines from 5 to 9, on page 2, 50 per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year, and so forth.

I think the gentleman does not intend to strike out entirely that reference to the 50 per cent quota and that his amendment should be as a substitute for (a) of existing law.

If I am in error, I will withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. JENKINS. I think the gentleman is right about that, and I have asked that paragraph (a) be made a part of the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I am speaking of that part of existing law which is found in the committee language which states that 50 per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants, without priority of preference as between such classes.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. JENKINS. It made no reference to the 50 per cent. The real heart of my amendment is that we set aside the 50 per cent and give them 100 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I stand corrected. The gentleman wishes to modify his amendment?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; I have modified it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask to have the amendment reported as corrected, leaving in subdivision (a).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, beginning with line 5, strike out down to and including line 12, and insert the following:

"(a) Immigration visas to quota immigrants shall be issued in each fiscal year as follows and in the following order of priority: (1) Quota immigrants of each nationality who are the fathers or mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over for a period of 12 months after the enactment of this act nonquota immigration visas may be issued to the fathers or the mothers of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over if such fathers or mothers are not able to procure quota immigration visas before the expiration of such time due to exhaustion of the quota."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 2, line 1, before the word "paragraph," insert the words "Paragraph (a)."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH: Page 2, line 1, before the word "paragraph," insert the words "Paragraph (a)."

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, just a word in explanation. As I read the bill in the form it now is in we would have two paragraphs (a) in the law, because it provides that "Paragraph (1) is amended to read as follows."

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio started out with paragraph (a), and the purpose of the amendment which I have offered is to straighten out the text.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Paragraph (a) is in the law now.

Mr. HOCH. Precisely so; but if you do not insert that in the first part of the Jenkins amendment, you will have two paragraphs (a) in the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Paragraph (a) also includes subparagraphs (2) and (3), and it is the intention of the chairman of the committee to have those paragraphs remain.

Mr. HOCH. Yes; but it says "Paragraph (a) paragraph (1) is amended to read as follows:" That leaves in the other paragraphs.

Mr. JENKINS. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I think before the gentleman from Ohio accepts that amendment he wants to give very careful consideration to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. I think it presents a very serious question as to whether or not the amendment now proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] would not entirely eliminate subdivisions (2) and (3), or whatever numbers they are, within paragraph (1).

Mr. JENKINS. It does not touch them.

Mr. BURTNESS. I know it is the gentleman's idea not to touch them; but if I understand it correctly, the gentleman suggests language that would read: "Paragraph (a) paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of section 6," and so on, is amended to read as follows.

Mr. HOCH. It does not amend all of the paragraph. It only amends paragraphs (a) and (1). At least, that is the intention, though I agree it is not very well worded. But without something of this sort we will have two paragraphs (a) in the law.

Mr. BURTNESS. Then it does not add anything to what is already in the committee bill and which has been left by the amendment already adopted, which is to the effect that paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of section 6 is amended to read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH: On page 2, line 1, after "Sec. 2" and before the word "paragraph," insert the words "Paragraph (a)," so it will read:

"SEC. 2. Paragraph (a), paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of section 6 of the immigration act of 1924"—

And so forth.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment. I think my friends are getting away from the point in making these amendments. As I understand, the amendment now proposed is, on page 2, in line 1, after the word and figure "Sec. 2," insert the following: "(A)." The purpose as expressed is not very clear. However, I call the attention of the gentleman proposing this amendment that it is absolutely unnecessary, for the reason that, on page 2, lines 1 to 4, inclusive, state the purpose of this part of this bill as now amended; whereas the balance of the page, in its amended form, gives the reading of the amended law as proposed by this bill. The amendment proposed from line 5 onward through the bill, in fact, amends the whole of paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of section 6 of the immigration act of 1924 and does not, as is apparently now proposed, amend only subsection (A) of paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN: Strike out all of page 2.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not consume all of the five minutes allotted to me. None of us seem to understand the amendments which have been put in the bill. The author of the amendments has worked on them to a considerable extent, and I do not like to vote for a bill unless I know what is in it. I have studied the bill and I have studied this subject. I want to restrict and the gentleman from Ohio wants to restrict. I think the thing to do is to knock out this section and recommit the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. We want to take care of these fathers and mothers. I think the gentleman from Ohio has perfected his amendment.

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman knows this is no way to write an immigration bill. He knows how carefully they have to be drawn by our legislative counsel—with much care and accuracy. I think we should delay the matter for the present and send the bill back to the committee for further study and perfection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: At the end of the bill insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of State shall instruct the various consular officers of the United States that in determining the application for admission as immigrants of alien wives, husbands, minor children, and parents, consideration shall be given to the moral and legal obligations in such relationships and to the natural inclination of such applicants to take steps to prevent such immediate relatives from becoming public charges, if at all able to do so."

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The amendment is subject to a point of order, but will not the gentleman withhold it a moment?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. We are making a farce out of the entire bill. The gentleman has a separate bill to take care of the situation covered by his amendment, and I respectfully submit that the amendment is not germane to the bill. It does not deal with the subject matter of the bill and does not involve the quota situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman will agree that there has been some criticism of the fact that the State Department has been unnecessarily severe in regard to its construction of the "likely of becoming a public charge" provision with respect to certain classes of relatives. The amendment contains directions to the Secretary of State to consider the legal requirements with respect to the moral requirements and the natural attitude of a man toward his relatives; and while I admit the amendment is subject to a point of order, I think it will be helpful if we want to bring in these relatives.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, what does the gentleman compass in the words "natural inclination"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have used the exact words of the instructions of the State Department.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

If there are no further amendments, under the rule the committee rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8174) to exempt from the quota fathers and mothers over 60 years of age of United States citizens, under the rule he reported the same back with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. At the proper time I would like to offer a motion to recommit and I would like to know whether that time has arrived.

The SPEAKER. The proper time to offer a motion to recommit has not arrived.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). On hundred and twenty-seven Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the rule under which we have been operating, as I understand, the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And if the House should now adjourn, conclusion of consideration of the bill would be the pending order for to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—UNEMPLOYMENT AND RELIEF FOR THE NEEDY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech recently delivered by my colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. CONNERY:

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS, CHAIRMAN HOUSE LABOR COMMITTEE, FRIDAY, MAY 27

As you know, my friends of the radio audience, Congress has of late been much concerned with the problem of unemployment and of relief for the needy. Numerous bills have been introduced in the Senate and House to aid the jobless and the hungry, and unquestionably one or more of these bills will be adopted, for there is every disposition on the part of the National Legislature to do its full duty for those citizens who are in desperate need at this time of crisis. As chairman of the House Committee on Labor, I have had exceptional opportunities to know the facts in regard to present conditions, and it has been my duty, a duty I have welcomed, to study the many relief proposals in the light of this knowledge. It is my conclusion, reached after a rather thorough investigation, that a great public-works program, financed in part by a Federal bond issue, offers the best means of lifting the United States out of its 3-year slump, since such a program would provide promptly the first and greatest essential—jobs for the unemployed.

I feel that that is the first and greatest need not only because the material needs of our people must be satisfied, but because the man who has a job is not only an asset to himself but to the Nation. That is true in a number of ways. In the first place, the man who is steadily employed is self-supporting—he can care for his family. That in itself is a help to the community, but even more, it is a help to him. He gains in self-respect once he knows that he owes nothing to any factor other than his own efforts. No honest, able, intelligent man likes to accept charity or any substitute for it except as a last resort. He prefers to pay his own way.

Moreover, the man who is employed is creating goods of value to the community. He may be building homes or public buildings; he may be raising wheat or cotton. Whatever he is doing, the consciousness that he is supplying a need is a good thing for him, and the wealth he produces is a good thing for the Nation.

Not everyone has realized, I am afraid, that perhaps the greatest and most serious losses of the depression—because they are irreplaceable—are not the losses due to chaos in the stock market and to the destruction of real-estate values, but the losses of potential creative effort which is not utilized, and the losses of numan efficiency due to lowered morale and lowered physical and mental condition resulting from unemployment.

If the eight to ten millions of men who are unemployed to-day were busy at work, the goods they produced would be a substantial addition to the national wealth. Those goods, exchanged for others, would mean revived trade and industry, and prosperity would not be a state merely to be hopefully awaited—it would be a condition affecting a very large element of our population.

There was a feeling in the earlier stages of the crisis that matters would right themselves. Probably that was the basis for much of the ill-considered optimism that has been propounded from various sources during the last three years. Now we are beginning to realize that matters will not necessarily right themselves, and that sound, capable, consistent planning is necessary to right them.

We can not get out of the depression by letting things slide. We can not hypnotize ourselves into the belief that everything is sweetness and light. We have tried letting things slide—we have tried Coueism—for three years, with the result that most of us are considerably poorer than we were when the sliding process began.

I would like to call your attention to a matter that has not received the attention it has deserved, and that is the failure of the public authority to extend the protection it owes to those who need it most. I mean to the growing children of this country.

We know, unfortunately, that too many of these boys and girls are growing up underfed and undernourished, deprived of normal opportunities for physical growth and development. But the public generally does not realize to what an alarming extent their opportunities for mental growth and development have been limited during this period of depression.

The District of Columbia is one of the few civic units in this country, at the present time, where educational standards are being maintained at normal. Elsewhere, too generally, the depression is being made the excuse for a lowering of standards, the net effect of which will be to hamper the growing child when the time comes for him to make his own way in the world.

May I interpose just a word here to point out that while the New England States, from which section I come, have in some respects been hit pretty hard by the abnormal economic conditions, New England is likewise holding firmly to the maintenance of educational standards. Public education is a tradition of New England, and it will be upheld, I am confident, at any cost.

But in one State, for example Arkansas, 750 schools were closed in the middle of the present year, according to press reports that reached Washington in February. These schools represent about 2,000 teachers and 36,000 pupils.

The plight of the Chicago school-teachers, who have remained faithfully at their posts in spite of the inability of the city to pay them, is known to the entire Nation. But it is not so generally known that in many cities cuts of 50 per cent in the salaries of teachers and supervisors have been made, and that 25 per cent cuts have been relatively common.

In too many communities classes have been enlarged beyond the point of efficient teaching in order to place more work on fewer teachers; and, too generally, expenses are being cut regardless of school efficiency.

I mention these points because they illustrate, I believe, a tendency that is fundamentally wrong. If we resign ourselves to lower standards of living and education, if we accept them without a contest, who knows how far downward the process may continue? We must make the fight here and now to retain the standard of well-being to which the great resources of this country entitle us.

The protection of the National Government must extend to the health and well-being of all. It should assure a reasonable minimum of health and security to every adult, and an opportunity for every child to grow up healthy in mind and body. We shall have failed lamentably in our duty if there is any neglect of the welfare of our boys and girls.

We have seen that we can not count upon matters to right themselves. That truth has at last, I think, been borne in even upon those most reluctant to see the light. At last the realization has come that the task is one that calls for intelligent planning.

Mr. William Randolph Hearst saw that more than a year ago and devised his plan for a $5,000,000,000 bond issue on the basis of recommendations by a group of nationally known economists. The time has come when that plan, or one substantially like it, must be put into effect, or I fear that our future may be very dark indeed.

Mr. Hearst is not, and, as I understand it, never has been, insistent that his plan be adopted just as his economists devised it. He wants only that the principle be recognized as vital to business recovery, and that ample funds be provided to bring it to realization. I believe that as men in public office become more familiar with the implications of the present crisis they realize that the principle of his plan is 100 per cent sound.

I believe the plan Mr. Hearst has sponsored would lift us out of our present travail. But I believe that adoption of that plan should be only a first step, to the end that we may never again feel the disrupting effects of so great an economic fabric, a conscious planning for the future, just as this plan has been devised for the immediate payment.

It seems inevitable that if we are to guard against depressions in the future we must grant labor a greater share in the industrial product. That can be achieved through the institution everywhere of the 5-day week and the 6-hour day. That is a practical program and desirable from every point of view.

War-time experience showed us that with millions of men in the Army and other millions of workers, both men and women, bent purely on producing goods meant for destruction it was still possible for us to produce everything we needed for the comfort and happiness of our people. The only industry that really lagged at that time was housing, and that lag was apparent rather than real, for had the labor expended on Government housing projects been utilized elsewhere the record would probably have been close to normal.

Our working men and women can produce in a 30-hour week all our population requires, and with that reduction in working hours they will have the opportunity to lead richer and fuller lives than they have ever known before.

To end the depression, ladies and gentlemen, I urge the $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan; to prevent depressions in the future, I urge the 5-day week and the 6-hour day.

I do not think there would be any difficulty about marketing a $2,000,000,000 bond issue for the promotion of public works, which would provide jobs for millions. Through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation additional credit facilities amounting to $2,700,000,000 could be easily arranged for loans to aid agriculture, commerce, and industry. Such loans should be made to States and political subdivisions of States and to any individual, trust, or estate, partnership, corporation (public, quasi-public, or private), upon the placing of proper collateral with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Three hundred million dollars for direct relief should be appropriated, to be available until July 1, 1933, to the President of the United States for the relief of persons residing in the United States who may be in need of the necessaries of life.

The President should have authority to use and employ such agencies as he may create for that purpose, or as may already exist and should have the power to disperse the same either as gifts or loans or money or of supplies to the beneficiaries. This would give the President an emergency fund which he could use to prevent actual hunger and starvation.

Government bonds are the safest of all investments, and ample funds are available if only sound investments can be found. Banks generally are in an extreme condition with respect to the liquidity of their assets. The financing could be done by a direct bond issue and by extending credit through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Restoration of millions of men to the ranks of the employed would mean an immediate demand for all manner of commodities. The public-works program in itself would stimulate business activity in many lines, and the human needs of the employed men, which they are now forced to forego, would add tremendously to the body of trade. If we put $5,000,000,000 into circulation, that certainly ought to prove sufficient stimulus to revive business. Surely it is the most practicable method the Federal Government can undertake.

Those who fear for the credit of the Federal Government are much too apprehensive. Uncle Sam's credit is as solid as a rock, and if anyone questions it, let him compile a few comparative figures showing where the United States stands by comparison with other nations.

The statement has been made on excellent authority within the last week that the United States might increase its national debt by $40,000,000,000—not merely five billions—without yet attaining a per capita debt equal to that of Great Britain. Yet to-day we are told, and with apparent truth, that economic conditions in Great Britain are somewhat better than they are in this country.

It seems to me definitely clear that the Federal Government must act in this emergency to provide jobs and to restore business to normal. A program of public works provides the most feasible method, and their financing through a Federal bond issue is eminently practicable. My suggestion is that we do not stint the amount of the bond issue, for until remedial measures are taken each passing day makes the need greater.

The demand for relief legislation is paramount. People will not tolerate much further delay.

Congress must not and can not forsake its duty to the country by failing to pass legislation for relief before it adjourns. And no political aspirations or party callings should block it in its objective if we are to convince the American people that government of the people, for the people, and by the people is a reality and not merely a euphonious phrase.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
